Complaints college 'falling apart' falling on deaf ears, say Innisites

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

Nobody seems to know about the repairs made to the front of Innis College, not even Stan Garrett, area supervisor for U of T's Physical Plant. When the masons who have been clinging to the face of the college for the past two weeks were called to his attention, Garrett replied: "Oh, uh, those men are just fixing a few leaks in the walls."

Kate Bishop, Student Administrative Council (SAC) representative for the college, says there are a lot of structural problems with the college. "We have been asking for repairs since September. The whole building seems to be falling apart!" Bishop went on to say that cracks in the plaster have never been completely sealed when the building was erected two years ago.

One of the original architects, A. J. Diamond, said he is not aware of any structural flaws affecting Innis College at the present time. He explained that a heat differential and faulty calking will cause cracks in walls of any building, old or new.

William Saywell, principal of Innis College, noted that water was seeping through holes around the windows of the building "that were never plugged up properly to begin with."

The cost of the repairs is not the responsibility of the college but of U of T's Physical Plant. Evan Pritchard, manager of Building, Fabrics and Gardens, says the work "shouldn't be costing that much — around $1,000 or so." Like Garrett, Pritchard was vague about cost and oblivious to any other structural problems facing the building. Diamond, however, estimated repair costs to be in excess of $3,000.

Although Innis College sported a banner from Toronto Restorations Inc., this company claims to have had nothing whatsoever to do with the construction at Innis. They affirm that someone has made off illegally with one of their banners, and would like to know who. In fact, Canadian Building Restorations is responsible for the repairs at Innis. They prefer not to quote any figures on their cost, however.

Scar's Balcony Square in turmoil

By HEATHER HILL

Scarborough College campus is run by a "controlling clique" members of the Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) and the student newspaper Balcony Square have charged.

These allegations and others have followed in the wake of the suspension of Balcony Square editor Gail Misiunas last Monday.

John Oster and Brent Schwalm, staff members of the newspaper, said in an interview that the problems leading to Misiunas' suspension were created in large part by photo editor Kraig Harris.

Schwalm, who has since left Balcony Square in protest, described Harris as "disruptive" and said he "reacted badly to criticism." Both Scarborough College students agreed that Misiunas was within her rights to "veto material, especially 116 pretty girls."

Oster was referring to the cover picture of the Christmas issue which portrays female students of the college. The photo provoked a disagreement between Misiunas and Harris and was cited as a ground for suspension in SCSC Communications Commissioner Mike Griffin's letter of dismissal to Misiunas.

Shortly after the disagreement, another letter was sent from Harris to Misiunas. A photocopy obtained by The Varsity reveals that Harris claimed all photos as being entirely under his own jurisdiction.

"Stick within your own sphere of influence, sweetie, and don't flip a kidney," Harris concluded in his letter.

According to Schwalm and Oster, Harris tended to monopolize the photos used in the paper. Schwalm also added: "I don't think he liked the fact that he had to take orders from a woman."

Oster said that Harris is merely the "catalyst" in the SCSC internal imbroglio. "He's the spoke but not the wheel," said Oster.

The wheel, according to former Balcony Square, SCSC and Communications Commission member Doug Ruggles, comprises "about 15 or 20 third and fourth year students who by their very experience tend to dominate."

Ruggles, who said he was quitting the Balcony Square in protest of Misiunas' dismissal, and the SCSC and the Communications Commission because of their "inability to allow councilmen to have any input," charged that the SCSC is "racked with petty politics."

He said that while he has been a commission member all year, he was never informed of or asked about any meetings or discussions. "I have no idea, haven't a clue" of commission activities stated Ruggles. He added he was unaware of Misiunas' suspension until he read about it in The Varsity.

Griffin said however that the commission "formally has had only two meetings and I personally told Doug about them in advance." He said that "as a rule" commission delegates, numbering about 20 potential and five active members, are informed of meetings.

Ruggles said that the "clique" running Scarborough College "tends to be very defensive and doesn't allow for new input from people."

He contended that the SCSC "should be replaced by an appointed body to rubber stamp things."

"It's a more realistic approach to government. We have an executive government, why not take it to the nth degree?"

Griffin said he didn't know Ruggles was quitting. He questioned the notion of a "defensive clique" and said that his control stems from having to do work that no one else could or would perform.

University cutbacks rapped

By PETER HOHENADEL

"Cutbacks are a disease that has affected all of U of T," said the president of the Graduate Students Union (GSU) at a public forum on university cutbacks last week at Sidney Smith Hall.

Speaking on a panel which included Ontario

Federation of Students (OFS) researcher Dale Martin, U of T Professor Mel Watkins, and representatives from CUPE 1230, the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) and the U of T Advisory Bureau, Leo Casey explained that the no-net-cost principle underlying Governing Council financial decisions results in the reduction of non-academic services or the increase of their costs for students.

Casey listed some of the services already affected by cutbacks. Library staff has been steadily reduced through attrition, several smaller libraries have been amalgamated, and library hours are to be cut again in the near future, according to Casey. He added that Roberts Library has experienced a net loss in its number of books over the last year because of a severely reduced budget.

As a student representative on Governing Council, Casey was able to describe the council's attitude that cutbacks are inevitable. "All that can be decided is how and where to cut," he said. He described the two premises restricting Governing Council's decisions. Council holds that U of T's operating budget is a fixed sum and that nothing can change that amount, according to Casey.

The second premise affecting Governing Council's decisions is that U of T will get its maximum allotment only if it acquiesces to the provincial government's education policy. Here Casey cited the apathy of Governing Council towards the visa differential fee.

Dale Martin pointed out that in deciding this year's budget for Ontario universities, the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA) assumed an inflation rate of 6 percent for non-salary expenditures. However, inflation increased 10 percent for non-salary expenditures last year. He termed this anticipated drop of 4 percent "unrealistic."

OCUA's final recommendation for increased funding from the government was $67.1 million. According to OFS, the minimum funding increase necessary to offset inflation is $85.3 million.

However, the provincial government has only allotted a $41 million increase for the coming year. According to Martin, the provincial government has now taken a "clear position to not even maintain the university system."

Mel Watkins, member of the Faculty Reform Caucus, supported Casey's view of a university system that tacitly accepts government cutbacks. "Unless there is great pressure on them, they (Canadian universities) will opt for submission to the government."

"We will not get very far unless a great mass of students mobilize themselves," Watkins said. To gain popular support for the campaign, Watkins suggested "a series of demands which confront directly the issue of getting jobs for students."

Subcommittees same scenario

By ANDREW MAHON

At last Wednesday's meeting of the Curriculum and Standards Subcommittee, Assistant Arts and Science Dean C.S. Churcher presented "exhibit A" — a report which the Faculty of Arts and Science has just completed for the Planning and Priorities Subcommittee.

Now the Curriculum and Standards Subcommittee is planning a three-year cyclical review of all university departments, but a certain amount of controversy surrounds the proposal.

"It's a wasteful duplication of efforts," said Dean John Ricker of the Faculty of Education: "What you have here is precisely what the Planning and Priorities subcommittee is involved in."

Curriculum and Standards committee chairman Henry Auster insists that his committee is not involved in the same questions as Planning and Priorities.

Committee member A.N. Sheps explained that the Planning and Priorities review is essentially "a one shot affair." "The three-year review," insists Sheps, "is a review of a different nature. We are concerned with questions of curriculum development rather than long range planning."

But the cyclical review is only part of the committee's problem, according to member David Tennenhouse.

"The subcommittee is overloaded with work," said Tennenhouse. "We have to deal with the cyclical review as well as the grading practices policy."

According to Tennenhouse, the grading practices policy got "dumped" onto the committee. Now it is faced with implementing the revised grading practices policy as well as the start of the cyclical review.

Auster said that the committee was well able to handle both the grading practices policy and the three-year review. "Once we get underway, and stop discussing procedures I think things will go well," said the chairman, "although we may have to take four years to complete the review."

Vic prexy moves up

By CHARLES MEISTER

"I am aware of the greatness of the university which I now serve. No one pretends that it is perfect or that it hasn't any weaknesses, but it does have essential greatness." These were the thoughts of Arthur B.B. Moore on the occasion of his installation as U of T Chancellor at Convocation Hall last Wednesday. Moore, President of Victoria University for 20 years (1950-1970) and a former moderator of the United Church of Canada, succeeds Eva Macdonald. Following a colorful procession of political and university dignitaries including Lieutenant-Governor Pauline McGibbon, Provincial Minister Thomas Wells, and President John Evans, Moore pledged an oath of office.

Evans officially installed the new chancellor by charging him with his responsibilities and authority. Moore was then robed by University College Principal Peter Richardson and University Beadle Leonard Smith.

"As I once more enter the university community after an absence of seven years, I am aware that many changes have taken place," Moore said. He cited the recent rapid expansion of the St. George campus and the formation of a governing council whose rapid production of committee and subcommittee reports "bodes ill for the forests of Ontario."

Moore also spoke about the "familiar problems" which have always plagued post-secondary institutions like U of T. "When was the university (or any university) not in some kind of financial crisis?" he asked. Moore noted the concern educators have continually expressed for the apparent lack of English skills some incoming students display.

"I rather think over the years these panicky references to poor command of English express a continuing concern that we shall have at least one language," the chancellor quipped.

As his first official act, Moore conferred undergraduate degrees on 500 of this year's 1,800 graduating students. He told the graduates, that "your involvement in what the university stands for goes on in your living." Evans added his congratulations and wishes for future success.

Students didn't save according to OSAP, survey finds

By ERIC McMILLAN

Over a third of Arts and Science students saved less money this summer than calculated on their behalf by the Ontario Student Assistance Plan (OSAP). And more than one in five students entered school this fall with no savings at all.

These are some results of a Varsity survey asking students how much they saved over the summer. The question was one of 16 regarding summer employment experiences. Twenty-two percent of students from all faculties indicated they saved nothing. As previously reported, 13.8 percent of students surveyed went without work all summer.

Under OSAP regulations, a student is expected to contribute a fixed amount regardless of actual summer earnings. The amount varies according to the applicant's faculty, year and sex.

A first year female Arts student, for example, is expected to contribute $504 whereas a male graduate student who has completed five years is expected to have saved $1,024.

The survey showed 40 percent of female freshmen Arts and Science students managed to save less than the $504 expected. Overall, 27.7 percent of women Arts and Science students saved less than the amount set out by OSAP, compared with 40 percent of males in the same faculty. A total of 34.2 percent of both sexes in Arts and Science fell short of the amount expected.

The student contribution for Arts and Science is calculated by OSAP according to a formula which assumes a 12-week work period in the summer. The same period is allowed for Applied Science and Engineering. Students in some other faculties such as Graduate School and Faculty of Education are expected to work for 16 weeks in the summer and thus save more for fall.

Despite indications that a large percentage of students do not save the amounts specified by OSAP, only one to two percent of students successfully appeal their student aid allocations each year. Critics have pointed out that one reason may be that appeals based on lower-than-expected summer savings cannot result in increased grants. Only the loan portion of student aid is affected by such an appeal.

The revised student aid plan proposed by Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, would take into account a student's actual earnings, but it is not yet known what the minimum contribution will be.

The Varsity survey shows 28 percent of students did not manage to save even $500.

The survey of 203 students was conducted by asking students in college and academic buildings on the downtown campus to fill out a questionnaire which was retrieved immediately upon completion.

Giving SAC a high profile, Tuzyk's principal task

By MARIO CUTAJAR

"We entered the year with certain objectives: to go after things rather than just react to them," Tuzyk told the Varsity last week. "SAC should be a very dynamic organization, pressing ahead on as wide a front as possible, as wide as human resources will allow," he added.

How has this year's executive tried to achieve this in practice?

One approach, according to Tuzyk, has been to involve more people in the decision-making process whereas in previous years, Tuzyk said, decisions were largely left to the executive, this year there has been more involvement on the part of the ordinary SAC reps, the "directors" as they are known inside SAC. Tuzyk admits that this decentralization has not yet reached the "optimum state," that the executive still has a leadership role. He feels however, that power will continue to be shifted onto the Board of Directors.

One other area where this year's executive has tried to apply its philosophy of "pressing forward" has been in its relations with other student societies, Tuzyk believes that SAC should take the initiative when it comes to getting the opinion of other student organizations.

Finally, Tuzyk has been concerned with increasing students' awareness of SAC. He said he found a general lack of awareness of SAC's activities during his election campaign and has since endeavoured to increase SAC's "profile."

Feedback indicates, said Tuzyk, that more students are aware of SAC this year. The council has the high profile Tuzyk set out to build.

What then does SAC's high profile consist of? Is it good self-promotion or is SAC really helping students?

Tuzyk believes that it is inevitable that SAC is represented in the student consciousness more by the services it underwrites than through issues directly involving students. His rationale is that a film program will always have a "higher profile" than student aid, whose implications have to be seen in the context of certain principles before they can become relevant.

What's the barrier to getting more students involved in student issues?

"Apathy is not quite the word for it," Tuzyk said. "Frustration about the possibilities of change" is the problem. When students doubt SAC's efficacy, according to Tuzyk, they doubt themselves. The solution, he feels, is to expose students to recent successes.

What about the Young Progressive Conservatives (YPC's) on council? How can a student council fight a conservative government when it's composed of an increasing number of members of the government party?

Tuzyk said the YPC's on council do not pose a threat to its integrity. "PC members on council are some of the strongest opponents of government educational policy," according to Tuzyk. In the case of unemployment the YPC's do not have to conflict with their party because unemployment is a federal issue.

said Tuzyk. Tuzyk sees no problem as long as "loyal YPC's don't get into council."

Still tactics by themselves are not enough. If SAC is to deal with the government from a position of strength it has to adopt positions students can support. Tuzyk takes this to mean adopting "realistic," "winnable" goals. Some people seem to interpret this as appeasement. Might not a militant strategy be more inspiring to students? Tuzyk's reply was that a balance is necessary. "We could win by giving up," he said. On the other hand, too militant a stand, would alienate students.

What about next term?

The most important question facing SAC is the fees referendum, Tuzyk said. The referendum will determine what SAC is going to be doing for the next six years, he said. Tuzyk claims that whether the fee increase goes through or not will decide whether students will get from SAC the same amount of action that they have been able to get so far.

Can money buy a SAC that fights for students? No, said Tuzyk, but students can make sure of providing the resources to enable SAC to fight.

Varg vote on Halifax meet

Five people will represent the Varsity at the 40th Canadian University Press conference to be held in Halifax between the 26th December 1977 and the 3rd January 1978. Seven Varsity staffers (George Cook, Mario Cutajar, Lorne Gershuny, Phil Libman, Eric McMillan, Brenda Miller and John Wilson) have let it be known that they wish to represent the paper in Halifax. Only five can go. They will be chosen today by secret ballot. All Varsity staffers, eligible to vote are asked to come and cast their vote. Voting takes place between 12 noon and 5 p.m. in the editor's office.

Balcony Square

As a member of the Balcony Square staff, it is my conscious duty to clarify some of the points which were so hastily covered in your headline article entitled "Editor suspended" (Nov. 30). The logical place to begin is with the "illogical" comments of Mike Griffin, the supposed Communications Commissioner of the Scarborough College Student Council. Mr. Griffin's letter to editor Gail Misiunas cites her "retirement plans" as the primary reason for her suspension. Let it be known that Gail Misiunas was, quite literally, driven to her decision during a highly one-sided media board meeting. There was no notification of the intended confrontation given to the majority of the staff and so, there was essentially no chance of a defence let alone a vote of confidence. To hell with democracy! It is interesting to find, among the inquisitors, one Kraig Harris — the photo editor of the Balcony Square who feels so terribly threatened by Gail Misiunas.

Mr. Griffin's second statement, that there was "constant antagonism" between Misiunas and other commission members, is merely a reflection on the nature of the commission itself. The commission, wherever it is hiding out, had very little contact with the editor. The only real "antagonism" came when Misiunas refused to attend Sunday council meetings for Griffin. It is obvious who was doing the actual work! Why should Griffin spend his Sundays away from home? He wasn't elected to his position. We didn't give him the responsibility, did we? It is good to have friends and so it is no mystery to see Griffin and Harris, hand in hand, wielding the axe.

Griffin's final charge, Misiunas' attempt "to censor" Harris' cover photo on the Christmas issue, is beyond the absurd, if that is possible. Here, anything is possible. Misiunas has never ordered anyone I know to do anything. She asks. When she asked for a thematic cover photo, she did not demand snow and angels. Harris' "116 pretty girls", however, is something not quite in keeping with the desired theme. Why would anyone want to look at a picture of "116 pretty girls" when one real, live "woman" cannot be equalled in any photograph! His attempt "to inject a little life into a rapidly stagnating paper" is not only ridiculous but also repulsive.

Mr. Harris "feels" that his photograph is not sexist. Perhaps not. But is Mr. Harris sexist? Isn't it a fact that not all of those "girls" gave verbal consent to be on the paper's cover? Isn't it a fact that in a memo to Gail Misiunas, a memo which stated that verbal consent was given, you also refer to your editor as "sweetie". And how DO you really feel about the "tits and ass" you mention in reference to the Toronto Sun? You don't fool anyone, little Harris. Really, your maturity is blinding. Your infantile ultimatum tops it off!

The most irritating thing about this whole mess is the simple fact that Gail Misiunas was pushed overboard before her crew was allowed to reach maturity. How much of a chance would the ever-responsible Griffin or Harris been given were they in her shoes? It is remarkable how these "men" whimpered and became such astute critics when the first signs of criticism appeared (Nov. 16) — criticism aimed at the Student Council and, "godammit!", right at the "dubious quality" of Harris' sacred talent! Instead of doing the intelligent thing, answering your critics, you remove an editor who "dares" to print criticism. If you haven't the guts or the intelligence to stand up to criticism, then get the HELL OUT! You don't belong in a university environment.

Peter Bernauer

Staff outraged

In response to Heather Hill's article concerning the suspension of former Balcony Square editor Gail Misiunas, we would like to speak in Gail's defence against the charge of censorship.

Kraig Harris, the photo director of Balcony Square, complained that Gail "started to bugger up the photos" when she began to exercise, even to a mild degree, the editorial right of selection. The issue centres around Kraig's insistence on putting "116 pretty girls" on the cover of the paper, instead of the proposed "broad spectrum of students". What it boils down to is Kraig's egomaniacal assertion of power. Note that he has a virtual monopoly over the darkroom, being its manager, and can thus effectively force the paper into printing only his material. Kraig's monopoly renders it very inconvenient for other photographers to avoid using Kraig's facilities — and he seems to have the right to decide which of their photos (if any) will be used in the paper.

Although many staff members were opposed to the idea, Kraig stated that: "I want to put pretty girls on the cover." But by threatening to withdraw all photographs taken for the paper unless his cover was printed, Kraig resorted to blackmail. It seems to us that in "suspending" Gail Misiunas, Council is supporting such practices.

Note as well that the paper is responsible to the Communications Commission, of which Kraig Harris is Deputy. This means that he has the power to override the decisions of his own editor! Kraig's holding of the positions of Photo Director, Darkroom Manager and Deputy Communications Commissioner could create a conflict of interest — if it hasn't already done so.

Also, Communications Commissioner O. J. Michael Griffin's threat of resignation if his proposed suspension of Gail as editor, based on the charge of "censorship" is not ratified by Council, reduces the democratic process to blackmail. Obviously the Commission wants her out. Could this, perhaps, be due to Deputy Commissioner Kraig Harris's difficulties in getting his own way? As members of the staff, we would like to point out that Kraig has been a disruptive influence on the smooth operation of the paper. This has progressed from minor verbal insults to mild threats and an increasingly patronizing attitude. In a letter written to Gail Misiunas, Kraig insisted that he was going to put "pretty girls" on his cover in spite of her original request, and told her to "stick within your own sphere of influence", advising her not to "flip a kidney", "sweetie".

We are sick and tired of seeing petty bureaucracies and "elite" cliques running the affairs of this College. And we are sick and tired of seeing such people abuse honest, hard-working students such as Gail.

Tuzyk on Parrott

With respect to your article "Parrott backs off" (November 30th), there was one serious mistake which needs correction.

In the article, I am quoted as saying that our suggestion that Dr. Parrott visit the campus in January was "almost instantaneously rejected". That is incorrect. The quote actually applies to my reaction to the proposed December meeting, i.e. SAC "almost instantaneously rejected" the idea of a December 22nd meeting. Neither the Minister nor his office have responded to the suggestion of the January meeting.

It should be noted, however, that, according to Dr. Parrott's timetable, any public meeting at the U of T after Dec. 31 will have absolutely no effect on the 1978-79 student aid plan. Any changes arising out of a January meeting will, according to the Minister, not have any effect until 1979-80.

Super Vixens sexist

We note with dismay that on November 18th and 19th, the U of T Film Society presented the film "Super Vixens" for the entertainment of U of T students.

While there are many films which reflect and indeed promote an objectionable view of women, we feel called upon to protest the showing of this particular film not only because it is sexist but because its entire appeal is one which promotes and sustains a dehumanized, objectified view of women without the redeeming virtues of artistic or social merit.

Our objection is certainly not motivated by a crusading zeal to uphold the moral purity of U of T students. But we do feel that, at a time when women are making strenuous efforts to overcome and overturn the sexism which exists in our society, it seems at the very least, insensitive, to select this kind of offering to promote on the campus. Surely, here at U of T, we could expect a level of awareness of women's issues and problems slightly higher than that encountered at Yonge and Dundas.

Author analyzes rape as "sexual coercion"

By CONNIE FILLETTI

Rape is only one form of sexual coercion according to Lorene Clark, Professor of philosophy at U of T and author of RAPE: The price of coercive sexuality.

Although a line is drawn at the threat of physical violence (rape), said Clark, "the basic problem — which is sexual coercion — is not being dealt with."

Clark and co-author Debra Lewis, a researcher at U of T's Centre of Criminology, began the book in 1973 and completed it in 1976. It is the first Canadian book on rape in Canada. A study of 117 rape complaints laid with the Metropolitan Toronto Police Department in 1970 was the basis of Clark's and Lewis' research.

The main premise the book establishes is that women are viewed as private property owned by men. Therefore, rape is an offence against property, not a person.

"Women are persons and equal persons, but as long as the historical legacy persists that we are private property, then rape will continue. There is a whole view that it should be kept quiet because it affects property value. There shouldn't be a conspiracy of silence but you can't blame women for what they don't know. Men aren't callous when they believe their property has been damaged. There is an element of the man as having been wronged as well," claims Clark.

She also believes that women in the productive labor force increase coercive sexuality because their value increases from the property point of view.

Clarke said RAPE: The price of coercive sexuality is an answer to Susan Brownmiller's book on rape, Against Our Will. She stressed the fundamentally different assumption Brownmiller makes — that women are forms of public property and that all men are rapists at heart.

Clark believes Brownmiller sets herself up for hostile attitudes by making such an assumption.

However, reactions by men to her book have been "pleasantly surprising," said Clark. "They never realized what was wrong."

She noted the police have been "extremely responsive," but Clark is less optimistic about the courts in Canada.

"No court has said, 'What can we do?' On the whole they are not as responsive so far."

The incidence of reported rape has increased over the past five years in Toronto, says Clark. She believes the current view that rape is not the worst thing that can happen is responsible for this trend.

Clark defines rape as a crime of opportunity occurring mainly at night. She says most rape is premeditated but is random with regard to selection of particular victims.

Any place like a university campus which has a high concentration of women is attractive to the potential rapist, says Clark. She advises women to "do what is rational to protect yourself."

Also, Clark believes women shouldn't have any obligation to resist. She claims the more women resist the more they get hurt. However, Clark cautions them to be aware at all times.

"Don't cower; be visible. Keep track of the men on the street. Be in control and plan a strategy. Don't do anything he suggests so that you aren't cooperating in his terms. Do anything to buy yourself time."

Clark says it is "all too common" that relationships break down due to lack of sufficient sensitivity by husbands and boyfriends for the rape victim.

According to Clark, they rationalize their actions by such myths as "she enticed it" or "she liked it." She says these men don't realize rape is the same as being hit by a truck. Shock may last anywhere from 16 to 18 months. "It is a psychological and physiological experience."

Clark applauds rape crisis centres, saying they perform "an absolutely essential function." She credits them with increasing public awareness of rape and its victims. However, she hopes there won't be a need for them in the future.

A Christmas Carol, featuring Dr. E. Scrooge

By ANDREW MAHON

"Twas the night before Christmas and throughout U of T, not a creature was stirring except Dr. E...."

Alone in his office at Simcoe Hall, Dr. Evans is lounging in his night cap and gown, and nursing a large brandy. Warming himself by a roaring candle, the good doctor ponders the Christmas season disapprovingly. The industrious U of T president is himself hard at work, counting piles of Canadian Tire money.

The effect of the brandy, coupled with the Valium burgers which Dr. E had eaten at lunch, cause the U of T president to fall asleep....

Dr. Evans finds himself floating high above the St. George campus. Someone or something is grasping him by the arm.

It is a ghost. Upon further enquiry, Dr. E discovers that it is the ghost of universities past, come to show him the true meaning of Christmas. The ghost beckons his frightened guest to accompany him. Dr. E, unable to consult the Governing Council on this issue, decides to accept.

As the two drift down to the campus, Evans is unsettled by the high altitude drop. He also has a bit of trouble maintaining a constant velocity because of sudden wind turbulence. The ghost gives him a Gravel.

Airborne above the university, the two peruse the campus of yesteryear. Dr. Evans smiles at the traditional Yuletide activities: St. Mike's students singing carols, Vic students guarding the E.J. Pratt library, and Innis students playing pinball. Doc can't help but laugh to see the playful Engineers romping and gambolling in the snow while taking deadly narcotics and indulging in their favorite festive drink: rubbing alcohol and ether.

"Ahh, everything is as it should be," thinks Dr. Evans, "— in balance." He turns to his ectoplasmic escort and asks him about the future. The ghost conducts him to cruising altitude again.

Dr. E looks around but cannot see the campus. He turns quizzically to his poltergeist pal. The ghost simply points to a small wooden outhouse at Hoskin and St. George labelled: "U of T: undergraduate courses given here — engraving also done".

Dr. Evans is shocked. He looks in amazement at the buildings he once knew. Alas, the Robarts Library has become a mammoth disco (The Floating Worlds), the Athletic Complex is a McDonalds, and the Campus as Campus Centre is the Campus as Simpson's centre. Even Hart House has changed "hands" to become the Midas Touch Massage Parlour.

Evans can no longer contain himself. He asks the amiable apparition to explain. The ghost (who fortunately knows about municipal politics, OSAP, and government funds) murmurs a single word:

— Cutbacks.

— Cutbacks?

— I'm afraid so, Evans. All those cutbacks forced U of T to regain capital by selling its buildings. Reduction of funds and facilities forced many students out of the university, and your enrollment plummeted. In other words, U of T really went down the tubes.

Evans poses with reconditioned Mini from Skulers.

By GORDON HERTZMAN

The declining value of the Canadian dollar may be conducive to a federal policy for reducing unemployment, U of T Professor Eric Kirzner said last Tuesday.

Speaking in a Sesquicentennial lecture, Kirzner pointed out that the government is following a policy of contractionary monetary policy — tightening credit, restricting the growth of the money supply and keeping interest rates high — in order to support the value of the dollar and check inflation. It is also following an expansionary fiscal policy which includes tax incentives and government programs to stimulate the economy in order to reduce unemployment.

But Kirzner would allow the dollar to fall further to a value where it can be artificially pegged.

Kirzner said the dollar should not be allowed to float, because its fluctuations in value discourage foreign investors.

The unsteady dollar also creates problems for the government, Kirzner said, which must plan balance of payments strategies, as well as trade and pricing policies. The stable dollar will allow for a greater amount of confidence in the Canadian economy; the cheap dollar will also allow the government to follow an expansionary monetary policy, Kirzner argued.

If the dollar is pegged at a low value, the fear of money leaving the country in search of higher interest rates diminishes, because the downward pressure on the dollar would be of no significance. Its value would not fluctuate, said Kirzner. Expansionary monetary policy entails the improvement of credit availability by lowering interest rates. This policy encourages new capital formation, expansion and job creation, maintained Kirzner.

— Gee, that's too bad.
— But don't despair, doctor. There's still time. You can save the U of T if you just...
— Are you kidding! This is great. Listen, do me a favour and grab me a Big Mac. I'm gonna take a quick massage, head over to Robarts, find me a good-looking babe, and get down to-o-o-night.

— But Dr. Evans, what about the spirit of Christmas? What about the U of T?

— Bah, Humbug.

Sixties recalled in raid on Rochdalites

By VICTORIA FREEMAN
on the scene

Metro police raided and abruptly terminated the seventh annual "Rochdale College Moravia-Bologna Embassy Ball" last Saturday night. At 12:20 am approximately 25 uniformed policemen entered University Settlement House and ordered the band to stop playing. A plainclothesman grabbed a microphone and ordered the crowd to go home without giving any explanation of the offences that empowered the police to break up the private party.

As people drifted out of the building, those who did not move fast enough or complained were hauled off to a waiting paddywagon. Police made 20 arrests: 12 for public drunkenness, four for violations of the Liquor Licence Act (drunkenness was permitted on the premises), two for possession of marijuana, one for obstruction of police and one for assault.

There appeared to be only one obviously drunk person at the party, who was asleep in a chair and there was less noise and disorder than at most weddings, dances or office parties. The police report however, stated that there were "broken bottles... vomiting over tables and floors" and people walking around "in a drunken stupor." Several witnesses felt that this description was a distortion, an exaggeration and possibly false; they stated that most people were more interested in seeing old friends than in heavy drinking.

The charge of obstructing police arose out of a scuffle between police and a man who became incensed when people were arrested for no apparent reason. He ended up staying overnight in Toronto General Hospital.

According to Superintendent Keighley of Division 52, the police were merely conducting a "spot check. The onus is on the police to check all banquet permits but we can't get around to all of them," he said. Keighley was not aware of any public complaint about the party, but said that police had received "information" of a violation of the liquor licence.

The superintendent also claimed not to know the number of police involved in the raid. He at first guessed that six plainclothesmen and "a few" uniformed officers were involved but later acknowledged that many more "might" have been involved. According to one witness, there were numerous policemen within three blocks of the party and the back seat of a squad car outside the building was filled with weapons partially covered by coats.

Most of the people at the party believe that Division 52 was deliberately harassing the ex-Rochdalians and used the Liquor Licence Act as a pretext. Several ex-Rochdalians at the party suspected that the raid was a deliberate attempt to create bad publicity for Rochdale College (even though it has been closed for two years) and for "hippies" in general.

Ernest takes to soap, loses job

By GEORGE COOK

Ernest Boyman was an average student at U of T. He worked fairly hard, got fairly good marks and had a fairly good time at the occasional pub.

Until
"Son, business is bad. The 'Nativity Soap' display isn't moving the stock. I'm afraid you'll have to get a part-time job over Christmas. Why not try Sonsimp's department store?"

Ernest applied. "Previous experience?" the personnel officer wearily asked.

"Well, I have a good background in soap," Ernest said. My dad owns a drug store and has put me in the soap department for the last 10 years. I know soap. I understand soap.

He was posted to toiletries. He was not alone
"Hi! My name's Dexter, but you can call me Soren Kierkegaard. That guy covered with rug rats over there is Santa Claus. His friends call him Alberto Giacometti."

Ernest had heard about this department store Santa.

"Aren't you the one who . . . ?"

"... ruins childrens' Christmases by promising them things like three pink MGB's or an evening with Charlie's Angels in the (delightful) flesh?"

Just then the floor supervisor walked by and spied Soren (Dexter) Kierkegaard, Santa (Giacometti) Claus and Ernest (Sonsimp's) Boyman standing together beside the 'Nativity Soap' display (picturing three Wise Men bearing specially gift-wrapped boxes of "Nativity Soap" to the manger).

"You're fired!" she said. "You should be pushing soap, not talking philosophy with the rest of the seasonal help."

Ernest was perplexed.

"What will Dad say?" he asked as Soren and Santa led him from the store into a nearby tavern.

"Must be his first time," Soren remarked.

"Either that or he enjoys standing on the bar yelling, 'What is this soap that has appeared in the West?'" Santa Claus said.

Ernest Boyman was an average student at U of T.

Grassi wants Italian media

By CONNIE FILLETTI

"Our interest is to bring to Canadian radio and television a larger and better understanding of our country," said Paolo Grassi, chairman of Radiotelevisione Italiana (RAI) at a press conference last Monday.

Grassi claims the interest of RAI is tied up with the fact that — in Canada — the Italian community ranks as the fourth largest ethnic group. Considering that most Italians emigrated within the past 20 years, Grassi feels RAI's obligation towards this community is even greater.

"We should give them, through the help of the Canadian Radio and Television Corporation, contact with the culture, news and events of their homeland. Our responsibility is to bring to their attention the Italian cultural life they have left behind," he said.

He stressed he was not here to defend the rights of Italians in Canada, rather "to help all Canadians understand what Italy is."

Grassi also told of RAI's wish to have attention focused on Italy at times other than those of crises or "hot news." He cited the widely publicized escape of former SS officer Herbert Kappler from a Rome hospital as an example.

In an effort to reach a wider Canadian audience (one not limited to members of the Italian community alone), Grassi feels RAI could disseminate its information in French and English.

Grassi explained there are two television and three radio networks in Italy. Plans are underway for a third television station that will be regional as opposed to national.

Questions arose during the press conference as to the political nature of the two television networks. Grassi denied that one represents the Christian Democrat policy and the other a socialist point of view.

"I don't believe we can say one is right wing and one is left wing. We have one network which carries programming of a popular type, representing a moderate political attitude."

"The other station is more sophisticated and represents the unrest that exists in some social classes and intellectuals in Italy. However, when one looks at the programming on the whole, the political differences are more difficult to discern. Sometimes they carry different viewpoints. The purpose of our new broadcasting law is to offer new viewpoints." Television is the summing up of different partialities."

According to Grassi, 13 out of 17 million homes in Italy have television sets. RAI gets 30 million viewers at peak times and 24 million at the beginning of programming.

Vietnam aftermath

By STEPHANIE ORTENZI

Post-war Vietnam is plagued by overwhelming rates of illiteracy, prostitution, drug addiction, disabled orphans and "economic backwardness," revealed Professor Tran thi An, member of the National Assembly of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam.

Tran thi An, executive member of the Vietnam Women's Union and her associate Le thi Thuy, the Union's deputy head of Foreign Affairs, spoke last Wednesday at the Quakers' Friends' House on the state of Vietnam today.

The need for reconstruction is not easily satisfied by any assurance that the country has high unemployment and a need for restoration, stated An. "Our priority now is production and to continue to organize food," she said.

Added to the three million unemployed, she said, there are one-half million ex-soldiers of the Thieu regime. "These soldiers have one-half million wives, children, and so on."

The soldiers are encouraged to return to their original place of habitation and "to exploit the land". The government provides free land and free housing in return for labor.

In national efforts to cure immediate problems, the government is organizing centres for aid. South Vietnamese illiteracy is "not a problem of the war" contended Thuy. It is combated in a growing number of schools.

Thuy said that since Ho Chi Min assumed power there has been a policy encouraging literacy and more participation in the liberation struggle. She added that the number of illiterates has decreased "in the two years of liberation."

Prostitution and drug addiction are combated both medically and culturally, according to Thuy. Prostitution is fought with penicillin which is "still greatly in need," and addiction is treated by acupuncture.

Both kinds of "victims of war" undergo an extensive education in history, politics and culture, Thuy said. Orphans are placed in natural homes where possible or in treatment centres.

The representatives said that Vietnam's backwardness is being combated by many countries. The USSR, China and the US provide scientific literature but Thuy added that it is often lost in shipment.

Morgentaler reflects

By GILLIAN O'REILLY

"Civil disobedience is a hard road," said Dr. Henry Morgentaler. The abortion specialist spoke at the First Unitarian Church last Friday night on "Reflections on Confronting the State."

Civil disobedience, he explained, is "often necessary, but it has to be chosen well because we need laws to protect society."

"You have to be sure that this law itself is unjust and that in its application it creates more evil than good."

Morgentaler chose to disobey the law nearly 10 years ago. As a public figure campaigning to change the abortion laws, he was often visited by women asking for abortions. He had to refuse, he said, because the operation was illegal.

However, he realized that "women who want abortions will get them, no matter where" and he heard too many stories of complications from "back-alley abortions." He decided that to refuse to help these women was like refusing to rescue a drowning man simply because the law forbade it.

Morgentaler said that he was relieved when he was arrested and could confront the law openly. At the time he was optimistic that the laws could be changed, since the United States Supreme Court had just allowed abortion on demand.

However, another issue, that of civil liberties arose. The Quebec Court of Appeals reversed Morgentaler's acquittal and the Supreme Court of Canada upheld this reversal. Many people, including John Diefenbaker, were shocked by this violation of the principle of trial by jury, he related.

The "Morgentaler amendment," which prevents the overturning of a jury's acquittal solved this problem. However, the abortion question remains. Morgentaler views the situation as polarized between two positions. The "traditional religious view," characterized by "dogmatism and arbitrariness," does not accept abortion under any circumstance. The "humanist, rationalist philosophy" respects a woman's right to choose for herself and takes in the variables of age and desire to have a child.

Morgentaler wants to see more clinics like his own. He pointed out that at the present time hospitals are the only institutions which can give abortions and each case must be passed by a board of three doctors. Ambulatory clinics, such as Morgentaler's, can provide safe abortions for the patient who can leave after a few hours' rest. Since there are no procedural delays, he stated, the operation can be performed early on in pregnancy when risks are less complicated.

The law, claimed Morgentaler, puts the onus on hospitals to protect women from back alley abortions. However, he added, the result is that hospitals endanger them by preventing early abortions.

Abortion is now accepted as a fact of life, Morgentaler claimed. The politicians of all parties deny abortion on demand because they are afraid of losing votes. Morgentaler is now collecting signatures for an open letter to the Prime Minister demanding repeal of the present laws.

Gov't grants mineral research money

By ARTHUR ROTENBERG
The Ontario government has announced a $2.7 million grant for mineral exploration research in Ontario universities. The grant is designed to provide incentives for the lagging Ontario mining industry.

The announcement was made by Natural Resources Minister Frank Miller at the 1977 McParland lecture, given at U of T.

The purpose of the grant will be to develop new analytic tools for deep mining exploration. Miller pointed out that most near surface deposits have already been developed and that further expansion in the Ontario mining industry requires finding remote deposits.

The new research program will give $550,000 a year for five years to individuals or groups of professors at earth science departments in Ontario. According to U of T Department of Geology Chairman David Strangway, professors must apply for a grant by submitting their proposed project to a committee which includes three university representatives, three industry representatives, and four members of the Ministry of Natural Resources' Geological branch. He is pleased with this selection mechanism because it involves peer group assessment, the same procedure used for evaluating projects within universities.

Strangway was also happy that the government had committed itself to cooperation with universities in acquiring geoscience expertise. He has been working for many years to convince the Ontario government that universities are best qualified to undertake the sort of research supported by the grant.

The reason for the timing of the grant was suggested by Miller early in his speech: "It is obvious from the recent record of investment and exploration that the industry is not attracted by mining investment prospects in this province under current circumstances."

Professor Gordon West of the Geophysics Department also pointed out that Toronto probably has the highest concentration of mineral exploration companies in the world. He believes that if Ontario does not maintain its mining industry, these companies might move elsewhere. He said that up to now other provincial governments have had more cooperation with universities in funding earth science research than Ontario.

Staff meet

The next Varsity staff meeting will be held at 2 p.m. January 13, 1978. So far on the agenda are the Varsity Christmas party, who should go to the CUP conference, coverage of Harry Parrott's Dec. 22 visit to U of T, SAC's orientation week, how to avoid line-ups at registration, what bugs you (e.g. Pauline McGibbon), next year's Red Cross Blood Donor clinic (you can't start advertising too early), allocation of pages, a motion of censure against the losers of the intra-Varsity hockey match.

Review of Toronto Workshop Production's "The Club"

I must confess to having initial doubts about Toronto Workshop Production's current play, "The Club", a musical play set in an Edwardian men's club, with all the roles being played by women. The role twist itself was an intriguing idea, but the biography of the author, Eve Merriam, worried me a bit. Merriam is the author of such things as Growing Up Female In America and "We, the Women", a CBS documentary on the history of women's rights in America, and is deeply involved in the women's liberation movement, and I pessimistically dreaded an evening of boring feminist propaganda. My anxieties, however, were completely unfounded, and I found myself at a play that was both delightful entertainment and a revealing look at shallow world of clubs, in particular men's clubs in the 1901's.

One of my own personal Hells would be a never-ending lobster dinner at the Don Mills Golf and Country Club. The difference between the Don Mills Golf Club and Merriam's men's club is chiefly one of outward attire. A club, particularly a social club, is usually no more than artificial grouping of people in the same income bracket, and in this play, the common denominator is sex, not golf.

The membership in the Edwardian men's club is limited by two factors—sex and income. The cost involved proscribes anyone who is of the wrong sort—that is, anyone who cannot afford to join. Within the club all men are, of course, equal, with the exception of the waiter who is definitely servant class, and the butler who is exalted enough to be made a fool, but not enough to be considered an equal. Gaiety in the club is achieved by a generalised regression to boyhood, shown in the acting of skits and the playing of silly games. The artificial camaraderie is enhanced by group misogyny—a kind of verbal gang rape with lots of elbows to the ribs and snickering about obvious phallic imagery. The club members' attempts to outdo each other generate lines which would be in extremely bad taste ordinarily, but when spoken by women are humorous while exposing the shallowness of that type of thinking. There are lines like, "Never run after a woman or a streetcar. There will always be another along in a few minutes," and "Marriage is a wonderful institution—but who wants to live in an institution?" One marvels at minds which actually functioned like that, and hopes that time have changed substantially.

The safe little world of these Edwardian gentlemen, with its vintage wine and its stock reports, is unexpectedly shattered by the revelation that one of the members, Freddy is having an affair with another member's wife. Freddy has not played by the rules, and the game has abruptly ended. The club members see each other objectively for the first time—Bertie is seen to be a jaded snob, Bobby, a wishy-washy follower, Freddy, a cad who is not to be trusted, and Algie, the cuckolded husband, merely a pathetic fat man. The smashing of the illusion of brotherhood and goodwill reveals the club to be a cheap deceit, and the members to be merely unhappy bigoted men.

Director Pam Brighton, along with Musical Director Iris Paabo and Choreographer Bill Orlovski have given us a crisp, animated production. The songs in the play are all from the period 1894-1905, and some of them are perfect, ("For a woman is only a woman, my boy, but a good cigar is a smoke"). The marvellous set by Michael Eagen is "Simpson's Georgian Room Elegance" at its best. While all the players were adequate, Sara Botsford's singing was a bit weak, and Maureen Fitzgerald was truly only convincing at the end when she could stop being jolly. Monica Parker's butler, James, is admirably stiff-upper-lipped, while at the same time convincing us that he would really like to unbend a bit and join in with the members as they rehearse a tap dance for their annual revue. Linda Thorson's characterisation of Freddy, the iterant womanizer is a true comic gem. Whether lifting an eyebrow in casual disdain, gushing on the phone to one of his string of women, or explaining why he would never marry, ("Why buy a cow when milk's so cheap?"), Thorson dominates the stage, showing herself to be a very fine actress. She has indeed come a long way since "The Avengers". Now, if we could only get Diana Rigg to play Wonder Woman...

Joanna Kidd

"And then I said, a woman is a woman, but a good cigar is a smoke."

A Gloomy Twelfth Night

Shakespeare's Twelfth Night outrightly entreats us to indulge our imagination and succumb to its ideal world in which fantasy is realized and dreams lived. For those of us who braved the raging elements during Monday's blizzard to attend the opening-night performance of Twelfth Night at the Ryerson Theatre, this quality of magical make-believe was sadly lacking. The production, directed by Shirley Tooke, is hopelessly tedious, a kind of "applied Shakespeare" or literal translation of the text to the stage. Tooke makes no attempt to analyze or interpret, nor allows her imagination to be fired by the power of Shakespeare's words. She has not arrived at a coherent and unified vision of the play; consequently there is no compelling dramatic force or spirit behind her production.

The set, two benches and several pillars in front and upstage a phantasmagoria of colour against a deep blue cyclorama, generally did not fulfill its purely functional purpose. The set does not serve the play, but the play the set, for each scene is forced to be staged in slight variations on the same blocking theme.

The acting was generally unconvincing and at times very self-conscious, especially Peter Van Wart's rather awkward Orsino and Sheryl Carson's heavy-handed portrayal of Feste. Again, there were two exceptions — Roger McKeen played a marvelously rollicking and rowdy Sir Toby, and Michele Fansett, as Lady Olivia, added interesting dimensions to a role usually interpreted as a static if not pallid foil to Viola's witty intelligence.

"Lacklustre" most aptly describes this production of Twelfth Night. Shakespeare's play is meant to be a celebration of life in the religious context of Christmas, the social context of the court, and the human context of man's sheer joy in living. At best the Ryerson Theatre production leaves us indifferent.

Diodes: digitless dupes rock on

The Diodes' first album is finally out. They were (and possibly are still) the first Toronto punk band signed to a recording contract by a major label. After signing they disappeared from the concert scene to record the album, prepare for British and American tours and add a little mystique to their image. An old show biz trick. Get the fans screaming for an appearance.

The Diodes were unquestionably an art school punk band that began, once the looseness of the New York punk scene drifted north, with the realization that it was an easy scene to crack. This was especially true in Toronto where there was an audience but no performers. The audiences consisted mainly of performers from Toronto's two dozen punk bands watching everyone else perform.

They quickly broke into legitimate news, with every straight paper and magazine from the Varsity to Quest, writing about Toronto punk. Now, eleven months after the Diodes had formed, their record is out and they are on their way to becoming rock stars.

If only I didn't have to say rock stars a la Ramones. But Paul Robinson, singer for the Diodes, has long been a confirmed Ramones fan. The production of the album, with the tracked-over guitar sounds a whining electric razor, which resembles the Ramones' album. The one different feature is that all the vocals are done with fake-British accents.

That is not a bad album. Two songs, a cover of "Red Rubber Ball" and "We're Ripped" (an original penned by the boys) have been released as a single and in your local juke box and are quite good. There is no let up in pace, everything has a good hard edge to it. The lyrics in a couple of cases are a bit embarrassingly amateurish, ("Natural Gids") but like the New York Times said last Sunday "The avant-garde in any art form depends partly on a defiant amateurism, on a stubborn refusal to learn the tricks of the traditional trade."

"Midnight Movie Star" lays it on the line. "We don't wanna pay no dues" the Diodes sing, they just want to be stars, cult heroes. "Artistic license is just hard sell". That is why the Diodes, from nobodies to potential rock stars in less than a year, must be admired. They made it through selling themselves hard.

The Diodes want to be rock stars. Who doesn't? They only way to be rock stars may be to sell out. This is the complaint most often levelled at the Diodes. Who am I to say whether they have, should have or were forced to produce a commercial product? Buy the album and see for yourself. You want to be a star, but you're probably inextricably mired in engineering or Near Eastern studies, so pick up the Diodes' album and see what you might have sounded like. Toronto needs more rock stars, more heroes.

"Superficiality
That's our specialty."

Michael Muzak shuts down with the house lights at Theatre In The Dell. The rinky piano tinkles and the spotlights shine again on the cast of Sweet City Lights, warbling and shuffling downstage to the tune of Toronto, the city of unrequited dreams.

Sweet City Lights is a parody of urban love, along with a lighthearted and lightweight poke at anyone else that crossed director Blaine Parker's mind. The scene of superficiality is Charlie 'n Joe's eatery, where the mood is undeniably, regrettably Toronto. Despite a parody of theatre critics that seemed to read my mind, the conclusion is unavoidable: it's all been done before.

It's all been done better too. The female members of the troupe, Suzette Couture and Rosemary Radcliffe, manage to keep in tune and in step through scenes from Looking For Mr. Candybar to a spoof of Gilliam Spellman, accepting an honorary Oscar and invoking the ghost of Dashiell Dammit. Frank Ruffo and Blaine Parker try a few songs under a nightclub spotlight, but the maudlin effect would make Mike Douglas wince. Put the four members onstage, singing and dancing together, and the softshoe shuffle choreographed by Frank Ruffo could make Gene Kelly grin. Unfortunately, the four part harmony was often out of step with the pianist, and Parker's delicate tenor could be heard searching for the timbre that would make the chorus resonate. He rarely found what he was looking for.

Much of City Lights' material came from the stock file of burlesque comedy. The one dollar cup of coffee gag, the flasher, and the guiltless transsexual all found their way into the repertoire. Of course, the Sweet City Lights are really ugly and fluorescent, and the revue played to the shadows of city life.

Sweet City Lights looks at the ugly lives of beautiful people, but the ultimate effect leaves the viewer looking for his bill and searching for a laugh. City Lights' warning that:

You'll end up like I did

The fantasies of maids

At the Artworks (20 Blecker Street), "Academy of Truth, Art, and Creative Submission" a production of Jean Genet's The Maids is currently playing. There is no doubt whatever that Genet's play is tortuous and demanding theatre, in no way designed to titivate, reassure, or compromise. Genet's objective is to disturb, and for the most part, this production directed by Steven Bush does precisely this.

From the start Bush establishes the necessary atmosphere of insidiously threatening mystery and an her servant and demanding praise for her own beauty.

They exchange an increasingly violent series of taunts until, suddenly, when the 'maid' strikes 'Madame', an alarm clock rings shrilly. The ceremony is over; we learn that the maid 'Claire' is really the maid Solange, that 'Madame' is Solange's sister, Claire, and that the two servants of the young and lovely mistress of the house have been enacting this fantasy of servility and revolt for, what is to them, an eternity.

This ceremony is the crux of so persuasive that I hesitate to express my major objection to the production. All roles in The Maids should, ideally, be played by men and indeed, in the first production Genet insisted upon it. Certainly, I don't feel a contemporary production must pay homage to Genet's personal sexual predilections, but then I don't believe homosexuality was the justification for his request. In his foreword to the 1947 edition of the text Genet states that his objective was to create characters who were "metaphors of what they were supposed to represent". By having women act the roles, Steven Bush largely undercuts this metaphorical dimension, thereby reducing the scope of the play's impact and limiting the boundaries of its world. He precludes many of the physical, psychological and social possibilities inherent in the fantasy ceremony of servility and revolt and misses an opportunity to crystallize and universalize the tragedy of the ritual murder.

On the whole, however, the Academy's production of The Maids works. There are a few technical flaws, such as arbitrary lighting cues and long-winded recordings of telephone rings and doorbell buzzers. Jane Foster does lapse into some awkward posturing and several times breaks the illusion of a ceremony by delivering asides to the audience, but these are not sufficient to reduce either the marvelous power of Genet's language and imagery or the intensity of the maids' agony.

inmanently dangerous eroticism. The set is a dazzling white — at once the rich and immaculate white boudoir of a lady of means and fashion, and the pure, almost sacred white of a shrine. When two hushed figures enter in excited anticipation, you realize you have just been initiated into a 'ceremony', of a sort, already in progress. While a 'maid' carefully lights candles around the room, 'Madame' strikes extravagant poses before her mirror, alternately vilifying Genet's play. Out of their desperate yearning to identify with the "great lady", whom they wish to destroy,

Claire and Solange eventually carry out the ritual murder of their mistress. The only glory the maids attain is in the single moment of self-realization during the murder. Claire says: "We shall be that eternal couple, Solange, the two of us, the eternal couple of the criminal and the saint." Their glory is realized in their relentless pursuit of the absolute — in Genet's universe, the absolute of evil, in the play's world, the absolute of murder.

The performances by Rhona Gold (Claire), Jane Foster (Solange) and Samantha Langevin (Madame) were

I left the U.C. Playhouse production of Drums in the Night with an uncertain feeling. Dan Stainton's direction allowed the tension of Brecht's early conflict between realism and expressionism to surface. Some characters appeared realistic (the prostitutes and drunks), others as caricatures (Mrs. Balicke, the vaudeville comics and Mankel), and some as a combination of the two (Mr. Balicke, Babusch, Kragler and Glubb). These interpretations were interesting but confusing. How much of this was a result of Brecht, Stainton or the varied acting ability, was not clear. Stainton's clever addition of sentimental music helps relieve our emotion: uneasiness about the comedy, yet the rational dialectic remains an obscure process.

The plot is a bourgeois love story set amidst the harsh reality of a fallen nation and a botched revolution. The Spartacist (Communist group in Germany, 1918) revolution failed because soldiers, like Kragler (Corey Copeland), started something they did not want to finish. After four years at war Kragler wanted to procreate, not fight.

Sets, costumes and interpretation made for a colourful, entertaining montage that expressed a transition in Brecht that was to be important to his later masterpieces.

Today's heroine & the ache of modernity

Margaret Trudeau by Arthur Johnson, Paperjacks. 210 pages: $1.95.

Literary history divides itself into epochs. Each period of extraordinary achievement defines its own forms. Any English major can recite the litany: Elizabethan drama, the rhyming couplets of the Augustans, the expanded fiction of the first decades of this century...

Curiously the thirty years which followed the Second World War have yet to produce a distinctive literary form. There have been significant achievements in almost all of the established genres but no one of them has asserted itself, and no new form has emerged as dominant. Acute observers, however, have noted the upsurge of biography, a form which has existed almost as long as there have been great men and women to act as subjects but one which has never really liberated itself from the frequently cast aspersion that it is a second hand, scavenging genre, the hyena of art.

Thus, although more people read biographies than read newly published novels, the form has failed to throw off the cloak of obscurity and take up the mantle of the leading literary genre. What has been lacking is the first genius, the writer whose talents reveal the possibilities inherent in the form to other writers of equal talent perhaps, but of less imagination. The materials are there. Biography deals with real life in a way that fiction cannot, or that twentieth century fiction feels it must not. As our ability to believe in the actuality of fictional figures has declined our faith in the lives of those who created them has increased. Virginia Woolf is far more important to us than Mrs. Dalloway. Writer's works are only important as stepping stones to their memoirs and to the eventual synthesis which only the biographer may supply.

But, as noted above, the form has yet to find its Wordsworth. Or rather its Wordsworth has yet to be recognised by the entrenched literary establishment. It is hard for me to believe that any discerning literary critic can read through the pages of Arthur Johnson's Margaret Trudeau and fail to see the marks of the master.

Granted his subject material is an advantage. Rarely has the twentieth century been the scene for a life of such centrality or with such potential for tragedy. Margaret has the grandeur of one of George Eliot's saintly and searching young women. She is a woman whose spiritual quest finds its echo in the life of each one of us. Consider her progress from the sheltered life of the upper middle Moroccan experience. Too many writers have come to grief in the attempt to present the essence of a mystical experience on the printed page (consider E.M. Forster's failure in the Malabar caves). On her return she is courted by the most powerful, most attractive man in Canada and is won over momentarily forgetting what she has forsaken.

To this point Johnson has led the reader with light quick steps for it is the tragedy of her life with Pierre Trudeau which is his real subject. Unlike the erstwhile Jacqueline Kennedy Margaret found that fame and riches were crushing her ability to be herself and to express her almost limitless talents.

This quandary, which is surely the dilemma which faces every woman in our society, is Johnson's true subject, one which he faces with unblinking eyes and unerring sympathy.

He realizes how easy it has been to laugh, the cynical braying of those who have fallen and envy those few who struggle on, at Margaret's trials. The cartoons which he has had placed in the book illustrate the shoddy mentality of those who have refused to understand. To understand, Johnson realises, is to enter into another human being and to bear the burdens that person carries. It is no easy task, certainly not one for those corrupters of the biographical form who rush into print pocket-sized volumes which deal cursorily with figures who are in that day's headlines. Johnson is not one of those. He deals with Margaret Trudeau with all the seriousness which great artists have always brought to bear on worthy subjects. Flaubert could glance from Madame Bovary to Margaret Trudeau and bow in approval.

When Johnson faces Margaret's painful attempts to make friends with her servants, or to make herself useful to the country, or to combat the de rigeur cynicism of political wives, he becomes Margaret. And as we read through these pages (pages decorated with the writer's delicately balanced but accessible phrases) we enter into Mrs. Trudeau and know the force of emotion which wrenched her songs and her poetry out of her body; we feel the magnitude of her final decision to take "the ultimate freedom trip" along with her grief at what that decision meant she must leave behind.

In these pages Margaret Trudeau becomes a modern St. Teresa. And, unlike such heroines as Dorothea Brook, she is a real human being, not the result of a writer's perverted imaginings. That reality is essential to our understanding and to our ability to turn to the figure of Margaret when we need the strength to carry on our own minor struggles. Like the saints and the heroes of real life Margaret has faced our trials in their most awesome and elemental form, and she has emerged scathed but triumphant. We may and must follow her example.

It is in this aspect, in the extrapolation of what is common to all mankind in the life of one great person, that Arthur Johnson has met his own great challenge. It is impossible to say enough about such an achievement. I am sure, however, that when future generations look back on us they will see, where we have remained blind, Mr. Johnson's work as the progenitor of a literary epoch of unmatched brightness.

class in shady Vancouver, through the horrors of mass education (a time when she was forced to fight for her right to be an individual and was punished for her refusal to surrender), through the bright awakening of the sixties at Simon Fraser University where she managed to understand the structure of the world outside in her penetration to the heart of her Sociology courses while remaining in touch with man's heart and life in her reading and absorption of William Blake.

Then she embarks on the pilgrimage to North Africa, seeking the revelation which is granted to the elect. Johnson is wisely reticent when he considers the exact nature of her (Moving On Up, Sydney Barrett, Crustacean Publishers: Calgary, hardcover, $12.95.

2 important scholarly works

The Oil Baron, Jonathon Pourri, Crustacean Publishers: Calgary, hardcover, $15.95)

Crustacean Publishers have recently released two very significant studies in the field of Canadian political sociology. One traces the class mobility of Spanish-speaking Canadians in Lethbridge, Alberta. The second book examines the key federal government post of Deputy-Secretary for Oil By-Products Imports, in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Both studies have far-reaching implications in the study of Canadian society, in particular, but also for the whole concept of man and society.

Sydney Barrett's book, Moving On Up (subtitled An Examination of the Avenues of Upward Mobility Available to First-Generation Spanish-speaking Immigrants in the City of Lethbridge) deals with a very warm and human topic in a very touching way. The author provides over 1,400 statistical data tracing the development of the heterogeneous Spanish community, and its branching out into the city as a whole. With brilliant insight, the author indicates that these immigrants and their children often have more difficulty securing comparable jobs to those held by established residents.

With massive documentation Barrett seeks to demonstrate government complicity in this inhuman conspiracy, and to illuminate the inherently repressive nature of Canadian Society as it now stands. He prescribes wholesale changes including the overhaul of the constitution to include 18 provinces, restructuring the office of the Prime Minister to include representation from municipalities of over 100,000 people and the establishment of a multicultural secretariat responsible to the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. With persuasive argumentation, he states these "changes should make Canada a good place."

Jonathon Pourri's book, The Oil Baron, deals with a vital and powerful position in the government, yet arrives at precisely the same conclusions as Barrett. He begins by tracing the background of those who have occupied the post of Deputy-Secretary for Oil By-Products Imports in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Amazingly enough, he finds that 82.71 per cent of these men and women were of White Anglo-Saxon Protestant origin (WASP for short). The obvious conditions for a government scandal must be clear to any reader. Pourri's fury is understandable and his discussion of the implications of such a finding are immensely lucid.

Later in the book he examines the role of this 'baron' in the government at large. The descriptions of Ottawa's beautiful people at work is thrilling as well as revealing. Diagrams of the Ottawa commercial district show that 67 per cent of all major Ottawa bureaucrats eat lunch in one of eight restaurants. The implications of this revelation for any possible conspiracy theories are enormous.

These two books represent an incredible addition to the quickly growing library on Canadian political sociology. No serious scholar can ignore the voices of these two authors, and Crustacean Publishers must be commended for providing them with a literary amplifier.

An shaggin' mutte

The Collected Poems of Shawn O'Burnly, Nottingburnshire Press, hardcover, Nottingburnshire, $49.95

*I hadna been a bleery stop,
 Whan yon did peel a' merry.
 An don 'ee ran a full till nop.
 We twassa stinkin' ferry.*

So wrote thee 19th century Scottish poet Shawn O'Burnly. And almost a hundred years later, time has proved him true.

The discovery of the O'Burnly manuscripts marked the high point of the Nottingburnshire literary conference some twelve years ago. O'Burnly, whose work had previously only been known through local bawdy songs, was immediately recognised as a minor poet. His poetry, written in an obscure Highland dialect known as Bleeri, was pounced on by critics and acclaimed for its obscurity.

Now, twelve years later, and fully one hundred and seventeen years since O'Burnly's tragic death by intoxication and rampant bull, his voluminous works have been brought together in one lavishly illustrated volume. Included are such rarities as his touching eulogy on the death of his mother:

*Twan she don, twan she don,
 Till mine of litty dead.*

*Twan she don, niver don,
 Till lne kick 'er in the hed.
 And the rollicking hilarity of his "wenchy" poems:*

*A happen by O there he ly
 Florrin Shaggo Mary,
 A til ban
 With wee tan*

An' bit her on the hairy.

Also included is O'Burnly's epic "An shaggin' mutte". The poem is written in O'Burnlyiac, a metre of his own invention. The metre entails a thirteen foot line, composed of two iambs, two trochees, a spondee, six more iambs and two dactyls. This is followed by an eleven foot line which is comprised of the same, minus the first two iambs. The poems is divided into thirteen line stanzas that follow a rhyme scheme of abcbdaefdfce. The poem, which is over five thousand lines in length has been alternately described by critics as "incomprehensible" and "gibberish".

At $49.95, this volume is a bargain. O'Burnly has been one of our most ignored poets. And rightly so. This volume brings him out of his mumbling, alcoholic stupor and into mumbling, alcoholic print. In his own words: "A hadna been nerry drop, na been so ble".

And how.

DIRECTORY

SAC has the list to end all lists, The Only List Of Its Kind:

The 1977-78 SAC Student Directory.

This 200 page listing contains the names, addresses and phone numbers of thousands of University of Toronto students.

Included in this year's Directory are some light-hearted drawings and a short note from Professor Marshall McLuhan. The 1977-78 Directory is on sale now for only fifty cents at all SAC locations: the Scarborough College SAC Desk, The Erindale Information Desk, the Sid Smith Lobby, the Dentistry Information Desk and the Downtown SAC Office. Be sure to check the On and Off Campus Classified, containing vital university numbers.

GRANT DEADLINE

The Project Aid Committee's second term deadline for submission of applications is January 10th.

As the SAC grants committee, Project Aid supplies money to worthy projects that benefit the university student body. Come in and pick up an application and a copy of the committee's guidelines at the SAC office as soon as possible.

The Project Aid Committee is composed of ten Board of Directors, whose co-chairmen are Don Crawshaw from Victoria College and Mark Wax from the Faculty of Medicine. After January 10th the Committee will review the applications received, and ask groups to appear before a meeting to submit oral presentations. Final grant approval will come the last week in January.

During the first term, twenty-four groups submitted applications, and five new, never before funded, groups were accepted. Just a few of the projects funded this past term by Project Aid were Italian Week, the Arab Cultural Night, the U of T Jazz Ensemble, the Debating Club, the Faculty of Education Student Placement Service and the Lithuanian Cultural Night.

Don't forget to pick up a set of guidelines with your application, as a detailed budget is one of the things the committee is most interested in seeing. Best of luck with your idea.

Innocuous Nippons WWII Canuck guilt

(Years of Sorrow, Years of Shame: the Story of the Japanese Canadians in World War II, by Barry Broadfoot. Doubleday: Toronto, 370 pp., hardcover, $12.50.)

It is of course completely impossible to review a compilation of documents except in terms of completeness. When dealing with 'oral history', the compiler simply shapes his material, letting it tell its own story and assume its own shape. It is a romantic version of quantum history, carrying forward a bulk of feeling accumulated by the "dark people" who never exist in recorded history.

Barry Broadfoot's most recent book is, like its predecessors, humane and non-judgmental. The issue of the treatment meted out to Japanese Canadians during the war years does not provoke quiet passions. Recently Prime Minister Trudeau apologized, in Japan, for this country's inhumanity during those years and was widely rebuked by the Canadian public for having the weight of blame out of all proportion to the activities of the two nations during those years. The wounds of the war are deep on both sides. Years of Sorrow, Years of Shame reveals that well enough.

Implicitly, rather than explicitly, Broadfoot is dealing with many very explosive political themes. How does one deal with the apparently divided loyalties of an isolated racial group in a country at war? Then and now the apportionment of guilt is a complex matter. Then, and now, the simplest solutions result from national economic problems and deliberate racial discrimination. Today, the victims of a similar peace-time hostility are those who are part of a non-assimilating immigrant population. In this generation, as in the last, the problems of such a group are compounded by unhappy individuals and complacent governments.

We do have the advantage, in Broadfoot's book, of seeing the issue stripped of its miasmic rebellious rhetoric.

We can see the quiet acceptance by most, if not all, Japanese of the hurts of the past and their persistence in building a new life in the old ruins, while accepting the framework, as given, of Canadian society. The tension between their loyalties is set down in first-hand reports which seem to show that Canada had no need to fear treason. The mentions of B.C. labour camps and of the deportations to Ontario are made in surprisingly unrancorous fashion.

What is an enemy alien? How, in a war-time context, are the rights of the individual to be measured against the security of the state itself? The extent to which deliberate injustice may be tolerated is raised by this book, and it should be read in that context. The Japanese, it may be argued, are a particular case: their loyalty is to land rather than to state, their choice of fateful acceptance rather than rebellion. Even so, Broadfoot's book, which is in no sense a soapbox, is suitable for Canadians of all origins to read this year — the hundredth anniversary of Japanese immigration to Canada, but only the quarter-century of their enfranchisement. The Japanese do not want guilt remembered; they say only, it will pass. But the issues have not and will not. Liberalism has some meaning even in a society that prefers black and white to the innumerable shades of grey truth.

ORCA

Orca, The Killer Whale by Arthur Herzog, Deutsche Gramophone Classic Paperbacks of the Millennium, 450 pages; $12.95.

It is always distressing when a great piece of art passes by the masses unnoticed. Accomplished authors such as Jane Austen and the Brontë sisters suffered from such ignorance. It is indeed unfortunate that another fine writer has recently been consigned to such artistic oblivion: namely Arthur Herzog who receives little critical acclaim despite the literary genius of his most recent opus, Orca, The Killer Whale.

Herzog developed slowly using such novels as The Swarm, a Brechtian treatment of killer bees, and gradually he refined his stream of consciousness technique, which he uses gracefully in this work on whales. It is Orca that is without doubt the highlight of Herzog's career, combining a smooth Joycean narrative with superb characterizations and stunning settings.

The plot is simple but elegant: an intense yet flawed fisherman, Jack Cameron, sets out to capture a Killer Whale. Unwittingly he murders the whale's mate, an interesting twist on the Oedipus complex, and is pursued by the massive mammal. The chase leads to Iceland where Cameron realizes for the first time his role in God's design on Earth, man's need for a Zen philosophy, and a deep love for humanity.

However it is not Cameron who is the true victor at the end of the novel, but Orca. This creature is initially driven by hate, due to his mate's untimely death. As the novel closes, Orca has Cameron at his mercy, but does not kill him. The strenuous chase has taught the whale that the quality of mercy is not strained. Live and let live. For Orca life goes on.

Perhaps the most impressive detail in Orca is the way Herzog describes the relationship between Cameron and a zoologist named Rachel. Herzog has captured the archetypal Twentieth-Century romance here and his love scenes are especially remarkable. His language is fluent but frank, for example:

They writhed in a primitive rhythm of ecstasy. She shuddered, screamed, as the night exploded around him. He fell drifted weightlessly in an endless void . . .

Herzog captures the primitive, sensual and debauched quality of love that we all witness and take part in each day.

In conclusion, ignore anything about the film version of Orca that you might have heard. The film is a bastardization of what must rank as one of the finest novels that literary scholars have seen in years. This novel is a must for any serious student of the English language.

News from the mid-brain

(Existential Bootie, ed. Norman O. Brown, Alexander "Toothy" Nephrites, Black Bottom Press: New York, hardcover, $17.95.)

This new collection of writings on the theme of existentialism is a welcome addition to any reader's angst, schienenspielen und freude. It contains much reading hitherto unavailable in any collection, and one or two pieces never before collected, such as Albert Camus' theme written in grade three, entitled "Hey! Maybe Death Isn't So Bad After All! Gee whiz!" (Freely translated from the French here.) Camus' theme is a remarkable find, especially considering the inauspicious origins of its composition.

Equally exciting is the by now classic "Existential Psychology My Way" by Dr. Paul Herder, in which he pleads for more probes into the rat's mid-brain, argues invincibly the case for provocation therapy, and laments the necessity forced upon him by professional requirement of seducing attractive older women in the pursuit of Gouldeinheim grants, first printed in Cosmopolitan.

Robin Morgan's icy, compelling "Existential Feminism, Or; A Hatchet Where it Will Do the Most Good," has to be read to be believed.

Norman O. Brown in his witty, erudite preface places each of his contributors squarely within the existential tradition, gossips about their private lives, and sighs mystically over India and the superior mysteries of the East: "I had a vision once in Calcutta. Beggars burning fiercely as a substitute for coal-oil lamps. Someone told me of an astral visitation by William Blake to the Taj Mahal in the historic year 1789. He is reported to have said Boh! and flown away. Sic transit architectura mundi! . . ." He also castigates Martin Heavisesides for his statement in an interview: "I sometimes think the whole existential movement was based on a mistranslation from the Danish and the Russian," and concludes with a prayer to Diurnus that the heretic may yet repent and be received again into the fold: "Sheep Stabbing Rampant In Japan And Peoria may be the headline any day now, so choose up sides and play up! play up! my hearties, and play the game!"

Treasures such as Billy Graham's "Jesus was an Existentialist, and a Revolutionary Too, Yep, You Bet!" with Daniel Berrigan's caustic reply, "Billy You Long-Necked Egregious Little Turkey Why Don't You Just Stuff Your Mouth With Black-Eyed Peas and Say No More?" or Timothy Leary's "Wheel" will have to be passed over with just a mention. The great piece in the collection unquestionably is also the longest, the fifty-page interview with Wildebarran Neitzsche the jazz imperialist, cogently entitled "I Don't Know My Dink From My Nose." Mr. Neitzsche is famous for playing the saxophone with the same proficiency with which others play the slide trombone and flute.

All in all, a collection well worth your time and attention.

A dynamic

"We are more ready to try the untried or rarely tried," wrote Eric Hoffer in the Ordeal of Change, "when what we do is inconsequential." Last week this statement was proven false. Two local theatre projects opened, projects which on the Toronto theatre scene must be regarded as innovations, and neither was inconsequential. Moreover, each was gifted with a certain amount of individual success.

The first opening was a collaborative production. Rudy Wiebe's play Far as the Eye can See originally produced at Edmonton's Theatre III, was written in collaboration with Paul Thompson and five actors from his Theatre Passe Muraille. This relatively new idea of cross-country collaborating in theatrical endeavours is a very necessary one in a period of economic disparity such as today's and may also help to break the provincial curse of the Canadian dramatic outlook. However, it appears that in this case there were so many cooks that a very worthwhile broth was finally spoiled.

Far as the Eye can See is based on a real incident concerning an Albertan town (called Dodds Round Hill in this production) striking out against a large corporation (Calgary Power) and winning. In this instance the ecologists win out over the energy critics. The coal will remain in the Albertan farmland so that the farmers can till their fields. But for how long? History has a tendency to repeat itself but necessity, the mother of all invention, comes first. As Peter Loughhead sprouts his vote winning verdict at the end a tractor in full preparation hovers above. An awesome fear is instilled.

Throughout, the play is framed in a historical perspective. Three characters (Chief Crowfoot, Premier "Bible Bill" Aberhart and Queen Victoria's daughter, Princess Louise Alberta, wife to Canada's Governor-General the Marquis of Lorne, who gave her name to the province) collectively called "The Regal Dead" hover over the actions of the not-so-regal living. Each has one opportunity to return to earth and to consult one of the living. The play's concept is fascinating. The result of the final text, however, is three and a half hours of frustration.

immigrant struggling to maintain some sense of personal dignity, and you find that the collective playwright has forgotten about them halfway through. All the characters come out half-baked.

Wiebe's ideas are worthy. The trouble lies in their consistency. Vainly I struggled to believe that a two-dimensional character like Caroline Kalicz, a mock-revolutionary drop-out, harping on socialism and free love, could turn into a backboned hero taking over her grandfather's farm and eventually saving her community. Her relationship with a Calgary Power engineer, John Siemens, breaks the boundaries of even melodrama. It is simply silly. Neither character deserves any of the sympathy they demand. They are too weakly drawn. Unfortunately, you have to struggle to have sympathy with any of Wiebe's creations. Not that it isn't worth the effort. Far as the Eye can See is. It's just that the worth comes to you in awkward flashes.

The second opening I attended this week was the University Alumnae Dramatic Club's production of Pinero's The Schoolmistress. Why was this an innovation, you ask? Simply because if the Alumnae had not dared to unveil this fusty "creaking delight" chances are no one would. (By no one I mean specifically Toronto Arts Productions who, specialize in producing wooden revivals of repeatedly revived classics and frozen productions of modern popular hits.) The bluestockings took the risk and won.

To say that Pinero's farce The Schoolmistress does not creak would be to tell a lie. Distance is the key. Here, unlike Wiebe's play, when we laugh it is at rather than with. Part of the fun for the audience is to see where the nails went in and Cicely Thompson, in a clean production which does not overtly mock the text, grants us that opportunity. There is no message to be hammered home here. The play is unashamedly entertaining. You can settle back and enjoy the antics of an overamorous husband and his headmistress wife with operatic tendencies. A myriad of characters pass by. The consistency of the text, which was so weak in Wiebe's play, remains Pinero's point of excellence. The choice between the two is yours.

Wall thinks ballet is real swell!

Last Saturday afternoon's performance at the O'Keefe Centre by the National Ballet of Canada of that Scottish fantasy, La Sylphide, was among the best performances I have ever seen the company give. Perhaps it was because Peter Schaufuss, the young Danish master of the Bournonville tradition, a dancer ranked among the best balletic technicians in the world, replaced an ailing Tomas Schramek at the last minute. Or because that cast change gave Nadia Pott's enchantingly elusive performance of the romantic sylph an extra edge? Or, perhaps it was due to the fact that the company had danced the same programme the evening before and, finding their second wind, exerted an abundance of nervous energy that it eagerly flowed over the footlights.

From beginning to end the company worked as a whole. From the refreshing simplicity of Potts' performance and the controlled precision of Schaufuss's glisses to the expert movements of the corps, the ensemble was never broken. Not once did Schaufuss as the idealistic James demonstrate during his portrayal the egotistical acting style associated with so many dancers of his international repute. Dramatically Schaufuss's performance was perfectly punctuated. Valiantly, he struggled as James to maintain his attentions for his fiancée, Effie. Painfully, he became progressively enchanted by the sylph. In the second act set in the magical forest of the sylphs, Schaufuss's James illustrated his jubilation through the extraordinary elevation of his entrechats and sautiers. Each beat sounded. Each landing was silent. Schaufuss had captivated the heart of the sylph and the collected hearts of his audience and fellow dancers alike. His enthusiasm was infectious.

It infected Nadia Potts' sylph. She stunned me. Never before has she danced better in a classical role in Toronto. Her extraordinary grand jetés, each increasing in elevation across the stage, were magical. As soon as she appeared she seemed to melt away. Her ecstatically tight bourrées playfully inticed. So sympathetic was her portrayal in this under-choreographed role that her death sequence became more pathetically touching than I have ever known it to be. As Madge, the embittered witch who gives James the poisoned scarf which kills the sylph and who reeks fatal havoc with the hero's entire existence, Jacques Gorrisen gave a theatrically rewarding performance. The sight of this shriveled figure knowingly nudging James towards his eventual destruction exuded an excruciating sting.

Albert Herring no cold fish

Britten opera: good if it could and it can

Albert Herring by Benjamin Britten is an absolute gem of a comic opera, one which has, unlike many of its genre, a genuinely witty and satirical libretto (by Eric Crozier), set to appealing, and memorable music. The current production of it by the Faculty of Music's Opera Department is in many ways a gem as well. It may not have been flawless, but then, the faults were insignificant.

The hero of the opera, Albert Herring, is a young man living in a small English town at the beginning of this century, who works in a shop with his widowed mother. The town busybody, the aristocratic Lady Billows, is in charge of a committee to select the annual Queen of the May, but problems arise since none of the village girls is deemed sufficiently chaste for the post. They decide to break with tradition and elect a May King instead, namely Albert, who has an unfortunately well-founded reputation of purity. Since he owes his "innocence" to the fact that he is painfully shy and dominated by his mother, rather than to any moral scruples, he is understandably much embarrassed by the whole affair.

The May Day celebrations prove to be the crowning humiliation, so that evening he screws his courage to the sticking place and goes out to spend some of his prize money on a night of drink and debauchery. When he finally reappears the following afternoon, it is with a new-found self-confidence that enables him to put outraged morality, in the shape of his mother and the committee, firmly in its place.

CHEAP LAUGHS UNNECESSARY

Obviously, the humour of the work does not lie in intricate plotting, but in the general situation, and the variety of characters so deftly portrayed in the music. And it is the musical excellence of the Opera School production, perhaps more than anything, which makes it so satisfying; the standard of singing for both casts is generally high, and the thirteen members of the orchestra under the leadership of conductor Michael Evans have done a fine job. Constance Fisher's stage direction is on the whole effective, after a slightly faltering start to the first Act. There are some moments when the humour comes perilously close to being heavy-handed, for example the wildly undulating posterior of Miss Wordsworth the schoolmistress, as she conducts a hymn of praise at the May Day Celebration. These bumps and grinds are amusing enough, but they are crude and inappropriate — cheap laughs which are quite unnecessary. I must add, however, that there are many nice directorial touches throughout which make up for the occasional lapses and awkward pauses.

Given the prevailing high standard it is probably unfair to single out only a few, but a word of praise must go to tenors Mark DuBois and Stephen Young, who are alternating the title role, and who both created a sympathetic and appealing protagonist. DuBois has a very lovely lyric voice, and he sings with great expressiveness, musicianship, and attention to detail. Young's voice is perhaps less even, and tends more to the dramatic, but both performances are successful, and in different ways, memorable.

Heather Wilberforce, as Lady Billows, is highly amusing in a suitably subtle way, and she certainly makes the most of the deliberately grandiose and high-flown music she has to sing; her speech at the May Day party is absolutely priceless, to mention only one example. The various committee members are presented as a nicely contrasted set of caricatures, though I think I would have found Carolyn Tomlin's Miss Wordsworth even funnier had she been a shade more restrained. Deborah Milsom and Blair House/Gino Quilico provide a well-acted and gorgeously sung pair of lovers as Nancy and Sid, who help to lure Albert off the straight and narrow. And then there is Jill Pert, doing her best to steal the show with her very accomplished comic portrayal of Albert's mother.

ENTHUSIASM AND INTIMACY

Designer Maxine Graham has provided a most ingenious set and appropriate costumes, and Ronald Kresky's lighting, while a bit pedestrian in the first and last Acts, is highly effective in the contrasting scenes of brilliant sunshine followed by moonlight in Act II.

However, for me it is the excellence of the singing that is the main reason for the success of the show, plus, of course, the fact that they are working with such a marvellously written and entertaining opera to start with. There is something about a young enthusiastic cast, singing in clearly enunciated English, in a relatively intimate theatre, which tends to make some of the Canadian Opera Co.'s efforts seem a little ponderous by comparison. I urge everyone who possibly can to forget exams for a couple of hours and instead run along and enjoy the story of the Emancipation of "Albert the Good, Albert who Should, Who Hasn't . . . and Wouldn't if he Could!"

Squeeze it 'til you're satisfied

(Juice: a seminal collection, ed. and intro. by Louis Berrone, afterword by Ronnie Barker, photographs by Neidweiler Machiavelli w. captions by Federico Fellini, Grove Press: New York, hardcover, $17.95.)

Here's a book for the Christmas connoisseur, a tome of rare and sumptuous photographs that will grace and adorn any coffee-table, even of the glass-bottomed variety. Here at last is Neidweiler Machiavelli's masterwork Juice, a concept book long-awaited — the more so as there has been considerable secrecy concerning this project which he has been working on for a dozen years ever since his triumphant Cabinet Design in Post-Renaissance New England: a Photo-Essay first appeared to thunderous applause from the jaded art photography community, sated with blonde nudes with long straight hair behind gauze and gossamer, in 1965.

The secrecy has been well warranted in this case, for premature exposition would have damaged the integrity of the concept. And what a concept! So simple, so obvious once thought of, and yet so far-reaching in its implications. Who but Neidweiler Machiavelli could ever have conceived it? The book consists of one thousand thirty-seven photographs of this topic of perennial interest and delight.

And they are a delight. From the wriggling spermatozoa teeming under a microscope, so like a group of Swiss villagers in a high mountain town, or a convention of the FBI in some secret smoke-filled room, to misty evocations of elegant cosmopolites dabbling it on one another's chests, to the hundred-odd shots at various angles, above, below, head on and in every kind of profile of the Relic of St. Anthony's No-No at Age Ten, preserved for centuries at the Church of Our Lady In Lace and Attractive Buckles in Baden-Baden. A holy object which is said, by inverted logic, to defend young boys from temptation to the venial sin of self-abuse and the depredations upon their manhood which might ensue. Each photograph is a tour de force.

One turns the pages rapidly with ever-escalating pleasure, and closes it gasping for breath, and with a deep glow of euphoria enkindled throughout your entire being by the performance. Memorable is his fifty-page study in depth of Klaus Richter's stunningly libidinal Semen Orbiting In Space said to be imaginatively inspired by something Buzz Aldrin blushing acknowledged shouldn't have happened in the course of the flight "but the darn lining of the suit was rubbing a guy something fierce. I'd surely like to meet up with the tailor who measured my crotch one fine day and tell him a thing or two about the cost of NASA's great space program to the ordinary taxpayer at large. Because we came awful close to aborting the whole mission because of that, you know. Cripes, can you imagine how that would have looked in the papers?" Within his study of the semen floating free in space (which resembles the Milky Way on a clear night) Richter has cleverly but non-representationally incorporated all the myths of mankind from the ancient Greeks and Romans to the dark fierce myths of the Nazis and the bedtime stories of Richard M. Nixon. Plus Mr. Richter's son's favorite teddy bear.

Many other delights await you in the book, and these I will not spoil by running through in description any further.

Some critics have objected that there is a certain ponderous humourlessness about this collection. That may be so, but the monumental and towering romanticism of the book, its warm and sensuous delineations, its dark and powerful majesty, more than make up for this cavilling flaw. Finally a collection of this sort transcends all criticism. And wait till you see what's on page 43!

SCHOOL OF ARCHITECTURE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO
230 COLLEGE STREET, TORONTO

The Hon. William G. Davis, Q.C.
Premier of Ontario
Queen's Park
TORONTO

Dear Mr. Davis

We, the undersigned students and staff of the University of Toronto's School of Architecture and Department of Fine Art, protest the decision of the Minister of Correctional Services, the Honourable Frank Drea, to demolish the Don Jail. Although we agree that it should no longer be used as a prison, we feel that the building has great architectural merit and all avenues should be explored for alternative uses before such a drastic measure be considered.

Destroying a building will not purge society of the wrongs that have been committed there. What it will accomplish is the destruction of one of Toronto's finest architectural landmarks of the 19th Century. At the time it was built it reflected an enlightened view of reform. William Thomas, the architect of this building, and also of the St. Lawrence Hall, was an architect of great skill. Unfortunately, little of his work survives. This well proportioned and beautifully carved building is a sample of craftsmanship that is impossible to duplicate in today's times. It is indeed a work of art and should not be destroyed.

There are precedents for re-use of such buildings. Ottawa has turned their city jail into a youth hostel. If this kind of thinking prevailed in Europe there would hardly be a castle or fortress left. There would be no Tower of London. The Don Jail is no less important to Toronto's history.

With imagination a new use can be found, so that the building can become a capital asset. Therefore, we suggest that demolition proceedings be postponed until a feasibility study has been undertaken. We are not convinced that this building has outlived its usefulness and even if this should prove to be the case, the building should be retired rather than executed.

His master's voice

Last week saw the unveiling of God's long awaited opus, the Niagara Escarpment just outside our own fair city. For sheer productivity, God is unquestionably the big bunny of them all. Unfortunately the Master's most recent work has bordered on the pretentious and the Niagara Escarpment is no exception.

God explains away the long delay in creating the Escarpment by commenting that he was 'unsure of which materials to use. Be that as it may, the Escarpment is a repetitive display that has but the slightest undulation to break the monotony; while rhythm is essential and indeed conducive to much of the Lord's work, here it seems that he has lost his touch.

Once again, Mr. Big has gambled in his choice of style; his latest production is without doubt functionalist in essence. Functionalism in art died a speedy death years ago, but God resurrects it; one from the vaults you might say. In this respect the Escarpment is similar to the show that our Maker put on at the Art Gallery of Ontario twelve years ago. The exhibition was crucified by the critics forcing the man to make a hasty exit. Let's face it, the man's a bore and he has not done a thing of value since he designed the Montana Badlands.

However in a recent telephone interview, God defended his Escarpment to me in the strongest terms, saying "look trash, at least the 'Scarp is good for more than looking. Functional art is going to be real big, I mean real big. Niagara was just a hole in the ground before the 'Scarp and now it's on the map. No one gives a damn about their O.H.A. jr. A. hockey team now. The 'scarp's the shape of things to come. Believe me, I know white boy!"

So far, it seems that critics do not agree with the holy spirit's view of the Escarpment. One expert called it an exercise in futility. Another described it as being the work of a has-been. Personally, I feel that it is definitely time for a sabatical for the man on cloud nine. I eagerly await the work of his son, whenever he makes a comeback tour.

What do you get when you cross a lobot and a turtle? A turtle with a reading problem. Why don't lobots play water polo? Because their horses keep drowning. What's a lobot tongue twister? Hell-o. Why don't lobots get along with retarded children? They don't like smart-alecks. Lobots think that veto powers is an Italian spy pilot. How do you know a lobot's been in your fridge? The door is open, the milk is knocked over, the mayonnaise jar is broken, there are fingerprints in the ice cream, tooth marks on the jello, the frozen meat has been clawed, and the ice is all chewed up. Ich weiss es nicht

"All the sounds of the earth sound like music" Oscar Hammerstein once wrote. I know of an exception, Oscar's paradigmatic principle not withstanding. Last night alto Lotta Seater and her accompanist Holden D. Wallup stunk up Wunfur Hall with their excuses for Strauss's Vier lesse Lieder and Schumann's Nichterliebe cycle.

Rick Schoenfeld of the New York Times calls these creeps "the finest art song performers alive". In my opinion, if Schoenfeld stopped sniffing the theatre seats and started listening to the music he'd be in a better position to judge.

Not that the performance was bad. Perish the thought. Guess again. Hell no. Indeed, the actual tangible physical playing of Mr. Wallup on the surface makes Horowitz sound like Elton John's elbows on a rough night. And Miss Seater's lovely rich tones make Maureen Forrester sound like a dog shitting razor blades.

Not only that. The paid displayed an unerring interpretive command of every imaginable detail of musical semantics. Their music-making was sensitive, poised, intense, fresh, and mature. But there was something missing. I mean that indefinable quality, that inscrutable je ne sais quoi or ich weiss es nicht which makes music more than a sequence of sounds organized with a view to formal beauty and the expression of the sublime.

I sincerely hope they will overcome this grievous fault before their next visit. And next time I don't want to sit in that seat that smells so funny.

Season's greetings to all those who, under essay pressure, are still reading this. Thank you to all who have helped us keep our sanity this year. Would Ms. & Mmes Ristmagi, Shaver, Rotenberg, Aslanides, Askin, Wallace and Torgov get in touch with me next term?

Brief listings for your Christmas pleasure: At Bathurst St. Theatre, 25 Lennox, Cruel Tears, eight shows a week, call 536-1101 for prices and show-times; Factory Theatre Lab, 207 Adelaide St. E., continued with Winter Offensive, call 864-9971; at the Firehall, Piner's The Schoolmarm runs Tuesday to Saturday at 8:30, call 364-4170 for details.

Arthur will tell you this too, but it's worth your while to see Albert Herring this Friday at 8:00; call 978-3744 and plead for tickets. The Phoenix has revived The Norman Conquests, call them at 922-7835 for scheduling. Opening at Redlight this week, at 8:30 tonight until the 17th, A White Marriage; at St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road, call 368-9094. The Royal Alex declines gracefully with The Circle, call 363-4211. At Ryerson, Shakespeare's Twelfth Night all this week at 8:30, and a Saturday matinee at 2:30; call the box office at 595-5088 for pricing details. The Smile Theatre Company presents a reading of two recent winners of its annual play competition, this Sunday at the Cafe Soho, 334 Queen St. W., at 2:00. Incidentally, if you happen to have an old script lying about the attic, this year's competition closes Dec. 31 and entries are eligible for $3,000 in prize money. Hmmmnn. Call 961-0050 for details on both competition and reading.

Tarragon continues Far As The Eye Can See, nights this week at 8:00 and Sunday matinee at 2:30; call 531-1827 to reserve. TAP continues The Sea, call 366-7723 and Zastrozzi still struts at Toronto Free, call 368-2856 for times and prices. The Club gives its bonhomie to audiences at Toronto Workshop, 12 Alexander St., call them at 925-8640. A slick, well-run show.

Reviews are one thing, revues another. Two listings of 'cabaret' this week, both well-done; at the Theatre in the Dell, 300 Simcoe Street, Sweet City Lights, call 598-4802; and now open at Schubert's Cabaret, Matene, Marlene, call 961-2460, a true cabaret, mixing art and politics in the context of Germany between the wars.

rock

Do you ever feel guilty over the Christmas break? As you sit at your holiday feast, stuffing your swinish little face with pounds of colourless, steaming food, wallowing in mash potatoes and gravy, making obscene flatulent noises of gluttonous satisfaction, do you every worry about the baby seals? Well you should. Show your guilty conscious, air your sins at the Bathurst Theatre on New Years Eve with Stringband. The proceeds from the three dollar door go towards environmental improvements. Marie-Lynn Hammond is leaving the band to pursue a solo career, so this will be her last gig with the band. Meanwhile Sex Pistols may appear on Saturday Night Live, December 17. Bye Marie-Lynn, hello sailors.

But the really big news is that Goddo is at the Knob. Good times.

Starchild is at the sublime young Station. Larry's has the David Mathews band tonight, the Midwich Cuckoo has Black Creek, The Riverboat has Willie P. Bennett, The Mocombo has Grover Washington, the Tube has the auspicious Medusa Lowe, the Shamrock (for you east end toughs) Dutch Mason Blues Band, and the J. House has Columbus and the Riverside has the eclectic Wendy.

On the Christmas concert scene, things are relatively jolly. Tomorrow Aerosmith will be at the Gardens with Ricky Derringer openings. Murro Mclaughlin is at Massey on the 21st. Rough Trade and Divine, the star of Pink Flamingoes, will be performing at the Hall on the 19th. Max Webster is playing with Moxey New Years Eve at the Seneca Field House and Rush (yippee!) is giving two shows sometime this month at some place I'd rather not mention.

The Diodes will be playing the Shock Theatre on the 19th. The Theatre is still running punk shows every Friday. Up and coming bands for this month include Cardboard Brains, the Toyz, the Ugly and Berlin. What more can I say.

And on a more personal note, I'd like to thank my elves for their help this season. Merry Christmas to Neil, BJ, Ann, Kevin and Tammy. Row-rrrr.

There's no shortage of dance this month. Beginning tonight and running through Sat. the 10th at 8:30 p.m., Dancemakers presents a choreographic workshop at The Toronto Dance Theatre Studio. $2. Reservations: 923-2538.

Dec. 8-10 at 8:30 p.m. Rinmon presents modern dance. $3. The stage is at 15 Dance Lab, 155a George Street. Call 869-1589 for details.

Coming up on Sunday is a unique festive presentation. Dance Sphere, a local group of modern dancers will perform Bach's Christmas Oratorio. It's a choreographic composition of the late American Charles Weidman being shown in Canada for the first time. The Oratorio will be repeated Dec. 13-18 at 8:30 p.m. and also Dec. 15-18 at 2:30 p.m. Evenings tickets are $5.50, $4.50, $3.50. Matinees will cost you $4, $3 or $2. For further info contact the voice at 923-2778.

York University's Dance Department faculty and students present a Christmas Dance Concert, 8 p.m. Dec. 13-15 Burton Auditorium. $1 at the door gets you inside and is a contribution to the students. Call York Dance Department for info: 667-3243.

The Toronto Dance Theatre is on campus at The MacMillan Theatre from Dec. 14 thru. 15. Peter Randazzo's Rectal and A Simple Melody makes up the program with Danny Grossman's Curious Schools of Theatrical Dance, Part 1 and David Farle's nameless piece based on the Phaedra myth. Tickets are $5 for adults, $3.50 for students. Call TDT: 423-7016.

For children, there are a couple of choices. The first is The National Ballet of Canada's annual production of The Nutcracker, choreographed by the company's founder Celia Franca. This year a matter of interest is Lac Amyot's partnering of Karen Kaln for the first time Dec. 24. Amyot moves like a big, smooth cat and is a National dancer to watch. Nutcracker runs Dec. 20-23 and Dec. 27-30 at 7:30 p.m. There are 2 p.m. matinees Dec. 21, 23, 24, 28, 30 and 31. Tickets range from $3.50 to $7.50 for matinees; $4.50 to $9 for evenings. Call the O'Keefe Centre box office for aid at 363-6633.

If you took your favourite kid to see The Nutcracker last year and want to try something different, Ballet Ys is mounting a work by artistic director Gloria Grant. Choreographed in the past, Crown of Hearts is a piece especially composed for children and will be shown as follows: Dec. 19-24 at 11:00 a.m.; Dec. 26 at 4 p.m.; Dec. 27-31 at 11:00 a.m. and 2:30 p.m. St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road, Adults $3.50, Children $2. Call Ballet Ys for info: 364-3428.

Toronto post-dancemaker Victor Coleman finishes the year at 15 Dance Lab, Dec. 22 and 23. Details as above. And, last but not least, have a good holiday.

A six-day pig out for Toronto opera lovers starts tonight at 8:30 in Toronto Free Theatre with the premieres of "blues opera" Lady in the Night (Norman Symonds and Hrant Aljanak) and Gilgamesh-based Enkidu (Harry Somers and Martin Kirsh). Crooner Julie Amato will star in the blues number. Tickets $5, runs through to Sunday.

The final performances of Albert Herring start Friday and Saturday at 8:30. See real review on page 25. Two concert (not stage) performances of Gounod's second best opera, Romeo and Juliet, are given at the St. Lawrence Centre Sunday at 3:00 and Monday at 8:00. The matinee is a lot cheaper.

Tomorrow at 8:30, the CIME organisation presents a taped concert of Hungarian avant garde material. $1.50 at the Music Gallery, 30 St. Patrick St.

This Sunday, CIRT presents a "Beethoven and Contemporaries" theme concert 8:30 in the Ryerson theatre. Program slates Lorand Feneyes in a violin concerto by Viotti, an important violinist but second-banana composer who died a few months after Beethoven. Tickets $5-7.

Other noteworthy December concerts include the totemic Messiah at Massey Hall (Dec. 14, 16, 17, no sing-alongs) and young American super-ensemble Cleveland Quartet at the St. Lawrence on Dec. 15. Same place Dec. 19, Lola Marshall and Anton Kuerti present a recital of major Schumann, Brahms and Schubert cycles. Do not miss.

You will have to consult one of the Varsity's competitors for lists of the plentiful Yuletide humbugs at city churches. Merry Christmas.

art

Christmas customs and decorations of the 1830s will be presented in The Grange at the Art Gallery of Ontario till December 31. The Robarts' Gallery puns on its next show — an exhibition by William Winter beginning today and running till Dec. 17.

On campus there's a new show at Hart House combining the etchings of Brenda Mitchell and the weaving of Jan Willson. Till Dec. 23. Also prints by Allen Smutylo are at Vic till Friday, and illustrations by David Blotstein.

Just off campus, The Group of One is a nationalistic "Maple Leafs Forever" exhibition. Painter, Max Epstein's oils on this theme are less interesting than his serigraphs accompanying the show. Cinema Lumiere has an exhibition of gum bichromate prints by Guy Staughton till Dec. 22.

The AGO continues the Henry Moore drawings and the paintings of Gerald Ferguson, a Halifax artist, through the Christmas season. But its major show is a collection of Laurentian paintings including works by Marc-Aurele Fortin, Goodridge Roberts, Jacques de Tonnencour, Patrick Landsley, and others.

Today's the last day of Toni Onley's silk screen paintings at the Gallery Pascal. Onley has achieved a considerable reputation in this technique. Prince Arthur Galleries will open an exhibition of 'Personalities' late in the week. Satirical drawings by David Levine of the New York Review of Books, Esquire and other U.S. mags) and Ohio-born Laura Ziegler, a portrait sculptor, will be featured. Walter Coull's watercolours close today at the gallery.

The Detroit Institute of Arts offers an acclaimed exhibition of Matthae's Paper Cut-Outs till Jan. 8. You don't have to go so far to see New Paintings and Serigraphs based on the legends and culture of the Cree, a show by Goyce Kakegamie at the Aggregation Gallery. Till Jan. 5. Aggregation also has a group show of artists whom they've shown through the year — Jane Martin, Robert Sinclair and others.

The Albert White Gallery has Pre-Columbian Art from Mexico till Jan. 4 while the Walter Engel Gallery has Ontario's pre-Columbian renaissance, young Woodland painters till Jan. 29.

John MacGregor is at the Isaacs Gallery with New Paintings reminiscent of New York abstractionists in the late 50s and early 60s. Till Dec. 10, Miro Malah's Recent Drawings are at the Gadatsy Gallery till Dec. 16, an intriguing show.

Ted Victoria's show Liquid Movement in Four Parts at the Electric Gallery till Dec. 21. In the same world of blistering imagination is the Dolls show and sale at the Merton Gallery till Dec. 31. Good source for Christmas presents as is the joint show and sale at the Artists Cooperative Toronto (424 Wellington Street West), opening Dec. 11.

Marc-Aurele Fortin has his own show at the Gallery Moos till Dec. 15. See it in conjunction with the Laurentian paintings at the AGO. Merry Christmas and may each one of you get crayons with a built-in sharpener for Christmas.

movies

Federal Pen
Dec. 6

What do I care about movies anyway? It's all Doris Day with her hands in John Wayne's pants to me.

Stupid pictures in the dark. Rip the screen down, that's my programme. Grind the popcorn into the ticket-taker's face. Assault the usherettes. Drop matches into the trenchcoats in the back row. Shit, when we went to the movies back in the MC...

Wednesday: The parole board sure makes you do the stupidest numbers for brownie points. What do I care if some quasi-ersatz-longhead joint with a limp-wristed wimpo name like Cinema Lumiere is showing a movie called Return from Africa. Why not Night Run from Tijuana or Road to Mandalay. And on that line the other movie's My Night at Maude's where they sit around and talk the way some of us lie around and +++++ and the man doesn't get laid. Worse than that is at the Revue where some jerk is showing Ulysses in which Bloom doesn't play the jack on the beach and Molly doesn't get to give Stephen head. The New Yorker has some crap about Jesus Christ being a hop head, or Dick Nixon. The Science Centre keep showing these flicks with nothing in them but chicks in Mao suits making gears and slopping around in the paddies. That ain't my revolution kids, if it's your's +++++.

Thursday: When will you guys up there realize that a Mel Brooks movie is about as funny as the FBI on the doorstep at two in the morning. You can go and see The Twelve Chairs and The Producers at the Revue but if you want to have fun you could molest somebody's afghan, or you could take posters of Ching Kai-Shek to the Science Centre and wave them during Sparkling Red Star.

Friday: Somebody tell me that this is the night after classes end. If your idea of celebrating is going to the movies you're not worth talking to.

Saturday: Ditto Friday unless you've got enough coke to fly you through a Marx Brothers triple bill — Horse Feathers, Monkey Business, and Duck Soup.

Sunday: It gets worse and worse. Maybe you should just burn down the city and start over. Do you really want to spend your life watching the spew of foreign ponies like Louis Malle and Luis Bunuel, Fellini and Wertmuller, and whoever makes 'Great movies from Poland'. Hasn't Europe been taking up space on the maps for long enough. Do you honestly think that a night of reading little white words on the bottom of a movie screen is going to do anything for you. Sure, you'll all go out and sit in some grotty room that calls itself a cafe and use all the words you picked up in sociology 243 describing the fall of man and the decay of culture.

Monday: Sure, and maybe you'll trot out your liberal line of crap and head off to the New Yorker to watch Metropolis and Triumph of the Will. After that you can say all those important things about the masses, throw patronizing words around, footnote all the causes, and hope that the chick at the next table turns around and wants to ball your brain.

Everyday: Yeah, you all make me sick. You're out there, committing crimes against life with every breath you take. You're wasting the air and you don't have the good grace to admit it. You should be in here, every last one of you. Maybe we can turn the movie houses into prisons, just brick up the entrances after the Star Wars crowd is inside, and the Bertolucci crowd and the crowd of trendies out to sophisto-giggle at Dinner at Eight. Just clear you off the streets, get you all where I am and you belong, all of you.

Yeah, Merry Christmas gang. I hope the turkey wedges in your windpipe. Love and kisses.

Blues Down Arch Rivals

By HOWARD DEANE

The Varsity Blues had to come from behind to beat their crosstown rivals the York Yeomen, 5-4 in a game played at Varsity Arena last Wednesday night. This was the second time this year that the Blues have come from behind to beat the Yeomen.

The game was scrappy and chippy throughout, as both teams played physical games.

Temper were so high by the end of the game that three skirmishes broke out during the last minute of play. Toronto's Dan D'Alvise was cut down by a York player after the game had ended and this precipitated a bench-clearing brawl.

It seemed the only player not involved was D'Alvise, who lay injured on the ice. It took several minutes before the ice was cleared.

The first period was controlled by York as they outshot Toronto 13-8 and outscored them 1-0.

Toronto came out flying in the second period with Rocci Pagnello scoring after only 56 seconds. Doug Caines, after recovering from a stiff check behind the net, shovelled the puck out to Pagnello who sent it past Bosco with a hard slapshot.

York assumed the lead less than a minute later when Jenner lost his stick on a breakaway save on Bob Schurr, who then recovered the puck and knocked it into the Toronto net.

Toronto tied the score at 2-2 on a goal by Ron Harris.

York took the lead for the last time when Glenn Wagner let loose a slapshot that went between Jenner's legs.

Harris again tied the score for the Blues at 3-3, taking a rink wide pass from Charlie Hughes and nailing it between the posts. Blues Captain Larry Hopkins put Toronto into the lead for the first time, after a York defender left the puck in his own end. The Blues left the ice at the end of the period with a 4-3 lead.

Once again the Blues came on strong and scored at the beginning of the third period, as Frank Davis potted one with only 14 seconds gone. This was the last of the Toronto scoring and turned out to be the winner.

York scored later in the period to bring them within one but it was not enough. The final score was 5-4 and the game was as close as the score.

Bob Schurr tucks the puck behind a stickless Dave Jenner while Rocci Pagnello (4) and Bob Gemmel (5) look on.

Blues Keep Rolling Along

By JIM O'LEARY

The Blues outscored the Queen's Golden Gaels 19-5 in a doubleheader over the weekend but only managed to come away with three points. In the Friday night encounter at Kingston, the Blues romped to a 15-1 win but on Saturday could only manage a 4-4 tie.

According to coach Tom Watt, it was not surprising that Queen's came back on Saturday night after the drubbing the night before. On Friday, Queen's was totally humiliated and had a lot to prove to themselves and their fans in the second game. "They worked a lot harder and came out to prove something," said Watt.

The Blues outshot Queen's by a wide margin in both games but goaltending made the difference on Saturday. "Queen's played the same goalie in both games. On Friday he couldn't stop anything but came back to play great on Saturday," explained Watt.

The Blues were leading 4-1 with under eight minutes to go in Saturday's game but fell to a late Queen's rally. Queen's scored when the Blues were two men short and then converted two faceoffs in the Toronto end into goals to tie the game.

Blues' Lines: The Blues' quick start has earned them the number one ranking in the country. The University of Alberta is second while St. Mary's holds third spot. . . . Defenceman Charlie Hughes will be lost for about six weeks as a result of a separated shoulder he suffered against York. . . . Lance Galtioni and Jim Snelinger should be ready to rejoin the team some time in early January. Galtioni has been out with a knee injury while Snelinger has been nursing a separated shoulder. . .

Fox Leads Basketballers

By CRAIG WARDLAW

The Varsity Blues basketball team showed incredible tenacity in taking a close 78-73 decision from the dogged University of Ottawa Gee-Gees Saturday afternoon at the Benson Building. Although the Blues led through most of the game, the persistent Gee-Gees were within striking distance at all times. Toronto's veteran guard, Doug Fox, once again led the team, racking up an impressive 29 points as well as keeping order in the sometimes panicky ranks.

Toronto had a comfortable halftime lead of 11 points but Ottawa coach John Scobie lit a fire under his team midway through the second half and Ottawa drew as close as 2 points of the lead through the dying minutes. Ottawa's renewed life came after some questionable fouls were called on the Gee-Gees. Scobie became enraged and, much to the amusement of the crowd, began berating the officials. Although his explosion was childish and perhaps unfair to the referees the dramatic show had a positive effect on his team. He was tagged with two additional technical fouls which, with the initial fouls, gave Toronto five free throws of which three were good. The Gee-Gees came out after this interlude ready to set the house on fire and almost succeeded. It was only Fox's cool presence which saved the day for an otherwise rattled Toronto squad.

The Blues controlled the boards throughout the game but this had little effect on Ottawa's scoring as they hit consistently from the outside. Ottawa guards Jack Eisenmeenn and Pat Signorotti picked up 14 and 10 points respectively with their incredible accuracy from outside the key. The only Gee-Gee to venture inside was Rene St. Fort and he picked up more bruises than perhaps his 11 points were worth as the Blues' Randy Cook frustrated his attempts. Cook himself displayed erratic shooting picking up only 8 points but his dominating presence picked off what seemed like every rebound and left the Ottawa forwards with open mouths and empty hands. Fine games were turned in as well by the Blues' Bill Pangos, filling in for the ailing Tim McGhie and by forward Joe Braunstein.

Blues coach John McManus was pleased that his team handled Ottawa but expressed some displeasure with the team's shooting. In the first half alone, Toronto had 51 shots and only posted 38 points, not a good percentage for a team that hopes to stay on the floor with Simon Fraser. The trouble was mostly with the inside shooting and tipping but many of the outside shots were well clear of the mark as well. Other than this, the Blues were by far the better team with slick passing, good fast breaks and steady defence which included some nice shot blocking.

The win puts Varsity in good position to grab a playoff spot if they continue their winning ways. With games coming up against Queen's and Ryerson they look to be in good shape for a successful season.

Fox goes to the basket for two of his 29 points.

1977: The Good, The Bad and the Mediocre

By HUGH STUART

Well, since everyone will have sung Auld Lang Syne before the next issue of the Varg hits the newsstands, I figured, what the hell, let's do a wrap up of the year in sports (O'Leary needed some filler anyway). So to the tune of "It Was A Very Good Year", this was the 1977 year in sports.

January

If the sports successes of this month were taken as an indicator of how the year would go, the men upstairs probably would have withdrawn all sports funding and used it to repaint the SAC dome. The hockey Blues (after returning from China) lost the Concordia tournament. The men's and women's basketball teams were eliminated from the playoffs. The women's ski team was upset in the U of T Invitational Giant Slalom, and to add insult to injury, Scarborough was on top of the Interfac hockey league.

February

This was the month that the hockey Blues upset York in the OUA final. This was the month of the PHE women who won the Powder Puff Tackle Football Tournament and the broomball championship. This was the month that swim coach Robin Campbell predicted that Waterloo wouldn't win the Canadian championship. And this was the month that Vic and SMC got hot and slipped past a slipping Scarborough in interfac hockey.

March

The big stories of this month were the OUA championships of the rifle team and the women's fencing team. A hungover rugby team grudgingly returned from New Orleans and the swim teams lost the CIAU championship to (yes that's right) Waterloo. Kurnik scored his way into SMC immortality as he potted the winning goal in SMC's dramatic interfac hockey final double overtime victory over Skule. Oh yeah, the hockey Blues trekked west defeating Manitoba and B.C. on the way to winning the CIAU final against the U of Alberta Golden Bears in Alberta.

April to September

There were no Vargs issued so who cares?

September

It was just your (yawn) ordinary September. The football Blues were winning. Soccer and rugby were starting to roll. O'Leary predicted that Scarborough would win the interfac football league (why wouldn't he, he's from Scar). Scarborough then slaughtered Skule. SMC got football revenge on defending champs Vic. And it rained, and rained, and rained to put the damper on sports in general.

October

A lot happened in October. After umpteen ads the Varsity finally got a women's sports editor who arrived just in time to report: the women's field hockey team's OWIAA championship; the banning of the slapshot in women's interfac hockey; and the beginning of another season for the Lady Hockey and Basketball Blues. On the other side of things, the football Blues once again bowed out of the College Bowl picture, losing to Laurier in an OUA semi final. Rugby and soccer played themselves right out of playoff contention and the Hockey Blues played their first game. In interfac football, Scar shut out SMC who were shut out by Vic who lost to the Engineers who lost to SMC who. . . . In other words Scarborough was undefeated while the other teams took turns beating each other.

November

Let's get interfac out of the way first. Scarborough lived up to O'Leary's expectations and capped an undefeated season by defeating a stubborn SMC squad in the Mulock Cup football final. The Maroons also added the soccer title to their collection of hardware. On the women's side, several colleges made a big step in their attempt to wrestle the Marie Parkes Trophy (symbolic of women's athletic supremacy) from St. Mike's. PHE won the touch football crown, New College the soccer tournament, and Erindale took the field hockey title. It was also a women's team that provided the sports highlight of the month as the field hockey Blues captured the Canadian university field hockey championship at Montreal. The men's Hockey Blues began their annual hogging of the back page as they slaughtered Western, Ryerson, Guelph, Laurentian and York. Not to be out performed, the women's hockey Blues took two of three at the York Invitational. Finally, to show that the month had its share of losses, the men's basketball team lost to two ringers from Philly who just happened to find their way into Laurentian University uniforms. . . but there's hope.

December

As for this month, if you can't remember back that far than you REALLY need a holiday. Merry Christmas.

Women Squashers Improve

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

The women's squash team has been competing fiercely these past few weeks, with teams from all over the province. And they have definitely improved their game since the start of the season. This can be seen by the positive results of the tournaments and by the participation of rookie players in competitions.

The two players who have improved most significantly this term are Donna Cameron, a graduate student in botany, and Chris Young, a medical student. Both these women began the season at the bottom of the squash ladder, and have since progressed to fourth and fifth positions respectively.

They are preceded by Queen's veteran, Portia Leggat, Gaylene Pron, and Eva Van Wouw.

A recent competition took place in Kingston, against Queen's University. Though U of T did not win all of her games, she gave this team a tough battle. Coach Ralph Rimmer is very optimistic about the next tournament against Queen's, scheduled to take place in February: "At the rate the girls are improving, we're sure to have them next time." The players are equally positive about their own performances.

On Tues., Nov. 29, the squash team competed against the Badminton and Racquet Club here in Toronto. Out of a total of 15 games played, U of T only lost 3. Congratulations! Portia Leggat never allowed her opponent more than 3 points in any of her games. Playing her usual hard-driving style, Gaylene Pron beat her rival significantly in 3 out of 4 games. Her scores were: 9:0, 6:9, 9:1 and 9:1. Rooky Donna Cameron followed suit, also winning 3 out of 4 games. Wendy Wadham, competing for the first time, beat her opponent 9:8, 9:5, 6:9 and 9:5.

On Sunday, Dec. 4, the squash team from the St. George campus faced the women's team from Scarborough College on their courts. Congratulations go to the downtown team, who emerged the winners. Keep up the good work, and best of luck in the new year!

Scar. Wins B. Ball Title

Scarborough College are the women's interfaculty basketball champions after a convincing 49-20 victory over PHE I in the final play in the Benson Building last night.

Scarborough dominated play throughout and controlled the backboards with frustrating efficiency. The Maroons were led by Fran Renaud who potted 16 points. Pam Storie added 14 and Laura Dampf, ten, to round out the leading scorers.

PHE got six points from Chang Tsai and five points from Sharon Betti in a losing effort.

Lady Blues Split

By CHERYL HOUSELY

Surely Coach Bradley and the Ladies Blues realize that Christmas is just around the corner. Carleton was certainly sure of this last Thursday. They must have thought that Christmas had come early as they led the Blues 26-16 at half-time in an exciting game that saw the two teams exchange the lead several times. After half time Jane Leuty, Barb Grochowski and Sharon Kosmachuk took turns playing Scrooge by scoring 12 points each. The Blues managed to turn the game around in the final minutes and came up with an exciting 53-47 win over the Carleton Robins.

On Saturday, the Lady Blues still did not have that Christmas spirit. The action was fast and furious as they took on the highly favoured Ottawa Gee Gees. However, the Blues weren't giving any gifts away. They led the Gee Gees 18-16 at half-time. Unfortunately the Blues were outshot (but not outshuffled) by the Ottawa team and the final score of 41-38 was in favour of the visitors. The game was a heatbreaker, as the Varsity team came within 3 points of a win.

Inspired play by Barb Grochowski (10 points), Sandy Turney (8 points) and Sharon Kosmachuk (5 out of 7 foul shots) helped keep the Blues in contention. Considering the fact that the Lady Blues went into the game as underdogs, they really gave Ottawa a run for their money.

Their record now stands at 3 wins and 3 losses. The Lady Blues may be stingy when it comes to giving games away, but their 3-3 record is the best Christmas present any coach could have.

A Santa Bound Sentiments

By JIM O'LEARY
and ANDREW MAHON

An unnamed source has recently revealed that the RCMP has been tampering with campus mail. Of some interest is the nature of some of the mail which has been intercepted and leaked to the Varsity sports department. Take for example this letter from football coach, Ron Murphy:

Dear Santa,

I have been a good coach this year. Please send me some offensive linemen, the new hit single: Complete victory speeches by Leo Cahill, a photograph of the college bowl (so I can see what it looks like) and some new mottos like: When the going gets tough, the tough graduate.

and this letter from John McManus, Basketball coach:

Dear Santa,

We don't want any American players. But if you must send me some, how about the Irving family (Julius, Marcus, Brutus, Mark Antony and Calpurnia).

There were also some other letters from Varsity teams including:

Attn. S. Claus:

We rowing guys would like an icebreaker, a fur-lined canoe and some money. Preferably lots of cash in small bills: tens or twenties. Please rush.

and this tear-jerker from Scarborough stables:

Dear Santa,

Do we have a team? If so, where is it? Equestrians.

Tom Watt was also trying to cash in on the Christmas season:

Dear Santa,

How are you? I am fine. Please send me the following: A TV contract, some competition, Roger Nielson's sideburns, inflatable dummies for the stands, and a Howie Meeker skate sharpener.

and the swim team wrote a small note to Santa:

Memo to Claus:

How do you expect us to win championships without skin-tight Speedo bathing suits? Please send a couple of dozen.

After reading this mail, the RCMP officers (who are a tender and compassionate bunch of guys) couldn't help but be touched as they tearfully folded these Santa-notes and carefully placed them in the incinerator.

O.J. ! Look out for the hawk

By HOWARD DEANE

Joe Hawco, running back for the Varsity Blues this year, has found himself a new profession — acting. He recently played the part of a nude model on the CBC series, The King of Kensington. He will also be more visible in the near future as he will be appearing on TV ads for the "Milk is Beautiful" people.

Hawco, a second year Physed student, spends at least ten hours a week weightlifting, in order to keep his body "beautiful". Because of this his teammates entered him in the Toronto Sun's Beautiful Body (not the SUNshine Girl) Contest. "It was a big joke at first, but then we realized it was kind of good publicity," he said.

Hawco ended up eighth in the contest, behind the likes of Clyde Gray and Dave "Tiger" Williams, but as he puts it, "It wasn't my life's ambition to win the Sun Contest". If anything he was somewhat embarrassed by the whole episode.

It was his appearance in the Sun that led to the offer of a role on The King of Kensington. "I had a laugh doing it, and it paid me pretty good, then all of a sudden someone phones me up and wants me to do milk commercials," commented Hawco.

Hawco, a boisterous and outgoing individual, takes this all as a big joke. He enjoys the monetary aspect, as it helps pay his tuition, but he does not plan to go into acting or nude modelling as a career (Sorry, girls).

"I'm just taking it as it comes. You can't really get hyped on that stuff because it comes, it goes, it's here, it's there, too undependable. And besides, it's cut-throat competition."

"The Hawk" was a quarterback all during high school "because nobody else could throw the ball." He was constantly told by his coaches and others that he should really be a running back.

This carried over to University and this year he was placed as back-up quarterback to Dan Feraday. At mid-season Head Coach Ron Murphy made a major change that saw Hawco move to running back alongside John Goodrow.

So if you see an athletic looking guy walking down the street reading a script, with a football in one hand and a dumbbell in the other, don't be alarmed, it's only The Hawk.

AUTOMOTIVE NEWS

From any angle the new Jaguar XJ-S from British United Automobiles is a sensuous car. The lithe monocoque body stretches over the frame like a tight skin. Even on the showroom floor, the XJ-S looks fast.

And thanks to the legendary Jaguar V-12 fuel injected engine, it is fast (0-60 in 6.6 seconds, top speed of 150 mph). With power-assisted rack and pinion steering, independent suspension all around, and four wheel power disc brakes, the driver is always in total control. The ride is quiet and precise.

But to call the Jaguar XJ-S just a sports car, would be to sell it short. Inside the roomy interior* are handsewn body-conforming leather seats that allow four adults to ride in comfort.

The driver faces a very complete set of monitors that check all vital functions. Controls for automatic transmission, air conditioning, interior and exterior lights, and power windows and locks are in easy grasp. A complete Blaupunkt sound system which includes AM, FM stereo, Short wave, and a cassette recorder with microphone, is built into the console.

In every respect, the XJ-S continues the tradition that has made Jaguar famous throughout the world.

Call the Jaguar men at British United Automobiles for a test drive. The number is 924-3341.

Because once in a lifetime, everyone should drive a Jaguar.

British United Automobiles has been a downtown landmark for more than 29 years. In that time, we've become Canada's largest and most experienced dealer of Jaguars. Our service facilities and staff are second to none. Take a mechanic like Jack Attwell for example. He's been with us for over 17 years. And Stewart Peacock, our service control manager has been a familiar face since August 1948.

Presently we have a large selection of the new Jaguar XJ-S available. And now, before the new models arrive in February, the price of each new Jaguar XJ-S from British United Automobiles is $24,000. That price includes every conceivable luxury — there are no extra options.

And even though every Jaguar XJ-S already comes with a very thorough one year unlimited mileage warranty, British United Automobiles is confident enough to extend this warranty to two full years (with a 25,000 mile limit). The same terms apply to any XJ-S leased from us, either on an individual or corporate basis.

We invite you to visit our showroom and take a Jaguar XJ-S for a test drive.

For an appointment, call 924-3341 and ask for one of the Jaguar men.

Scar's paper resolved finally

By GEORGE COOK

Scarborough College Student's Council (SCSC) replaced Gail Misiunas as editor of the college newspaper, Balcony Square on Dec. 6, by appointing former assistant editor, Stew Bailey, to the position.

The councils vote was unanimous to accept Misiunas's resignation published in the penultimate issue of the paper last term.

This followed an 8-7 vote against a motion tabled by Mike Griffin, SCSC communications commissioner, calling for ratification of his earlier decision to suspend Misiunas.

Neither the suspension nor the decision to accept Misiunas's resignation and replace her with Bailey have been ratified by the newspaper's staff.

Following the defeat of the ratification motion Griffin walked out of the council chamber. A letter of resignation was then presented on Griffin's behalf by SCSC president John Shalagan.

"In light of the defeat of the substantive motions put forward by me in regard to the operation of the communications commission I no longer find my position tenable. I trust that you will be able to fill this vacancy with someone who enjoys the confidence of council," Griffin's letter states.

The council however voted not to accept Griffin's resignation and went on to express its confidence in his abilities as communications commissioner. Shalagan said yesterday he expects to hear by this week whether Griffin will remain the communications commissioner.

Bailey and Craig Harris, the paper's photo editor involved in the dispute that led to Misiunas's suspension, were present at the meeting and took part in the voting over whether or not to ratify that suspension. Misiunas was not at the meeting.

Problems arose last November when Misiunas, in her capacity as editor of the paper, attempted to keep a photograph portraying "116 pretty girls" from running on the front page. The photograph was taken by Harris, who is also SCSC Deputy Communications Commissioner.

Griffin was asked by Harris to intervene and he then suspended Misiunas, and asked Harris, Bailey and a third member of the staff to put out the final 1977 issue of the paper.

"I think maybe it was a bad decision. Perhaps it would have been better to suspend both parties," Griffin said before the council meeting.

Students will have to dig deeper into their pockets next year: Governing Council passed the full six dollar increase in Health Service fees at their December 15 meeting.

A working group had been struck last March to help clean up the Health Service, which was having trouble trying to pay for itself. They recommended, among other clean-up suggestions, that the university subsidize the Health Service for its non-student users, and that the students take a $3.50 increase, accompanied by a $50 thousand cutback in the service itself.

Internal affairs, however, decided the students should pay six dollars more, rather than cut back the service. This recommendation, with the others, they passed on to Governing Council.

Student Representative Michael Treacy, told the Governing Council the issue of a Health Service fee increase was definitely a student issue. "Students determine the level of service they provide themselves," he said that this was the only fee increase students

New OSAP stalled claims Bounsall

By KEN WHITEHURST

Students receiving government assistance will probably not get grant or loan money for the school year beginning in September, 1978 until January, 1979, according to NDP critic for Colleges and Universities Ted Bounsall. He says this because the Ministry of Colleges and Universities' work on the revised Ontario Student Assistance Plan (OSAP) is behind schedule.

"OSAP forms were traditionally made available to awards officers in February. The ministry had hoped to have its final selection of cutoff points — cutoff points being how much students must contribute from their summer earnings and how much parents must contribute — made by December 5. They missed that deadline, and their next target date is January 26, which means there is no time to make forms ready for the awards officers by February. It will be at least another six or seven weeks, probably April," explained Bounsall.

The ministry's Manager of Information Services Tony Bain said: "I am worried I won't be able to get brochures and other materials for high schools awards officers ready in time." Bain confirmed that work on the revised OSAP plan is a month and a half behind schedule.

Student Assistance Planner John Bonner thinks the ministry should be ready to accept applications for assistance by the end of March or the beginning of April.

Bounsall does not think that awards officers will be able to counsel students about how to fill out the new OSAP forms, because there will not be time for them to understand the new criteria for the program.

"Due to the tardy development of the program, confusion will reign supreme throughout the summer and into next fall. Students will be withdrawing from university next fall because of not receiving sufficient money to continue," warned Bounsall.

Carol Vaughan, executive assistant to Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott, denied that the work on the revised OSAP is behind schedule, and charged that Bounsall's remarks were "a kind of scare-mongering."

Bain revealed that the revised student assistance plan will not provide the optional interest-bearing loans for students with special needs that had been promised in early ministry statements concerning revisions to OSAP.

He also said that five or six million dollars will be set aside to help ease the way for students already in the old OSAP system who will be affected by the changes.

There will be a loan remission policy for students who entered university under the old system. This means that students ineligible for grants from the revised OSAP — including professional and graduate students — can borrow the money from the government they would have received as grants. When those students finish their educations, the government will turn its back when they do not repay the part of their loan received in lieu of grant.

The economic criteria for receiving assistance from the revised plan have been determined. The ministry is not yet prepared to release this information, but Bain said the criteria may be seen by some as a "retrograde step."

SAC rejects l'ANEQ funds Radio Varsity

By BLAIR HUNTER

Recognition of the Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec (l'ANEQ) as the national student organization representing the nation of Quebec was rejected by the U of T Students' Administrative Council (SAC) at their last Board of Directors meeting in December.

SAC voted to return to the National Union of Students (NUS) the motions put forward at the NUS Calgary conference held last October. The first motion recognizes l'ANEQ as "the National Union of Quebec students and (affirms) that relations between the two organizations (NUS and l'ANEQ) be conducted on equal footing, respecting the autonomous character of both."

A second motion recognizes the "bi-national character of Canada and further recognizes that Quebec as a nation has the right of self-determination."

Employing the new NUS policy that allows member student bodies to discuss motions before officially voting, SAC completed the first stage of the process that will lead to the official NUS stand vis-a-vis l'ANEQ and Quebec. The two motions in their amended form will return to SAC from NUS later this month. At this time a write-in vote by the NUS member bodies will complete the final stage of voting.

SAC's External Affairs Commissioner John Doherty argued that recognizing Quebec's right for self-determination "does not mean that we agree with separation."

He added: "Quebec as a nation can have several linguistic groups in it... and l'ANEQ does not claim to represent only the French, but all students of Quebec, two Anglo institutions are incorporated into l'ANEQ."

SAC president John Tuzyk voiced criticism of the whole voting process, saying it was "badly handled."

"The final decision should be made at the NUS spring conference in St. John's. This way, it's all in the mails."

Tuzyk also disapproved of the second motion. "You don't just grant someone self-determination. They either have it to begin with or they don't," he said.

The student council meeting also came closer to deciding the fate of Radio Varsity.

Former Chairman of the Radio Varsity Management Board, Wes Brown, rejected the idea of campus radio, begging SAC to "consider carefully the concept of Radio Varsity because it is unlikely that it will ever fulfill any of SAC's objectives."

SAC agreed to allot the minimum amount of funds necessary for an attempted resurrection of Radio Varsity, but expects strict accountability and a full report in March on the status of the operation.

Health fees increase did not have input into.

"Internal Affairs did not give consideration to students," he said.

John Burnes, chairman of the working group, noted that the Ontario Hospital Insurance Plan (OHIP) recovery on the Psychiatric Service was only about $60 thousand (compared with a cost of $200,000). "It's hard to imagine a private service with that large a deficit," he said.

He said he felt there could be a "more efficient distribution of service," especially in the summer use of the psychiatric service.

Dr. George Wodehouse, director of the Health Service, said that comparing the Health Service to private services was like comparing apples and oranges. "In private practice they line them up by appointment," he said. "No one (in university) would turn up after three weeks; they'd either be dead or better."

He said the psychiatrists employed by the Health Service work on an 12-month basis; and cannot work on a nine-month basis as Burnes and the committee suggested.

Hare: U of T has vital role in North

By KATHY CANTY

U of T has an important role to play in the research for northern development because of the many reputable scientists here, according to Kenneth Hare, U of T professor of geography and physics and Director of the Institute for Environmental Studies.

In a brief presented on December 16 Hare told the Royal Commission on the Northern Environment how it could obtain the scientific advice of the academic community.

Headed by Justice Patrick Harrt the commission was created last summer to study the effects on the physical and social environment of major enterprises north of the 50th parallel. Preliminary hearings were held in Toronto three weeks ago in response to pressure from concerned groups in southern Ontario.

The commission should establish a "scientific advisory group" made up of respected members of the scientific community, according to Hare's brief. The report also recommends that the commission consider "asking for — and paying for — the help of selected scientific research agencies outside the federal and provincial services." These should be "bodies whose independence is not in question."

Government studies are often suspected by Indian groups and other people in northern communities of being biased, said Hare. Independent bodies such as universities are considered to be more impartial.

Hare also criticized politicians for not making sufficient use of the scientific information available to them. Long term scientific solutions to environmental problems are often rejected because "politics is a short term game in Canada," he said.

Prof says nuclear wastes can be safe

By KATHY CANTY

Burying nuclear wastes will not pose a hazard to the inhabitants of the sites chosen, said Kenneth Hare in a recent federal study on the long-term storage of radioactive waste materials of nuclear reactors.

If there is an accident, it is best to have the waste deposited in an area of low population, but he said "I don't think these wastes will ever escape."

The study recommends that the government bury these wastes in special sites in northern Ontario. These areas contain a large number of plutons, the rock bodies suitable for the disposal of these materials, said Hare. It is also relatively low in population, he added.

Environmental groups, however, are critical of Hare's report. Jan Marmorek, coordinator for Energy Probe, objects to the report's assumption that it is safe to continue the production of nuclear energy.

"The best way to deal with nuclear wastes is simply not to generate them in the first place," she said. She would like to see a great deal more study on the problem of wastes disposal, before any recommendations are made.

Ralph Torrie, Research Consultant to the Ontario Coalition for Nuclear Responsibility, agreed. He felt that the government should not go ahead with a nuclear program until the disposal problem is further researched. Torrie also said that the scope of the report is too narrow because it deals only with wastes emanating from power stations. It should also deal with the wastes of other aspects of the nuclear fuel cycle, such as mining, milling and refining, he said.

Libraries seek help

By JOHN D'ANGELO

The financial straits the U of T library system is navigating this year are worrying the administration enough that attempts will soon be made to elicit public donations.

At a meeting of the Advisory Committee on the University of Toronto Library System last December 15, an interim report of the subcommittee reviewing library cost allocations suggests that the committee "consider ways to bring home to the administration and to the university community the nature of the damage being done to the library as a vital teaching and research resource by the changing budgetary priorities of the university." Subcommittee member Professor Frank Watt also voiced concern that there is still "little understanding of the consequences of the financial squeeze."

Professor Peter Yates suggested that a "publicity piece" in the administration's publication, The Bulletin, might be appropriate. However, Carol Weiss, head of the Reference Department commented that "an understanding in the university community will not give us any additional money." She suggested that an article in the Globe and Mail might further aid the cause.

Despite the feeling of Ian McGugan, SAC representative, that it is still "premature to go leaping into the Globe and Mail," and the apprehension of Watt, who warned of headlines reading "Crises in University Library System", it was generally agreed that such an article would be beneficial. The committee is now taking steps to have it covered.

Library cutbacks, which have amounted to a reduction of about one-third the total budget in the last eight years, has already reduced reader services and library hours. Inflation and the recent substantial devaluation of the Canadian dollar will also seriously affect the book fund next year as fewer publications, especially periodicals, can be bought.

Hillel fire

By KEN WHITEHURST

A faulty fireplace put the torch to the Hillel Foundation at 186 St. George Street on New Year's day.

The fire started in the floor and walls around the fireplace at the front of the first floor of the building, which Hillel has occupied since 1947.

No one was injured by the fire, which started at 8:30 p.m. and was under control by 2:30 a.m. Four people live in the building but two of them were out of town and the other two had gone out the evening the fire started.

The back of the building only received smoke and water damage, but the front of the building was burned out from the basement to the third-storey roof. Books in the foundation's library were damaged by smoke and water. Foundation Director Ben Mayer is investigating having them freeze-dried, as were the books damaged in last year's fire at the Sir Sandford Fleming building.

Damages to the building have been estimated at 125,000 dollars. Mayer said: "Our intention is to rebuild the foundation and move back in."

The Hillel Foundation is a Jewish student service organization. The building was used for parties, lectures, educational programs, a Sunday school and occasional religious services.

The foundation will be opening temporary offices at the Young Men's Hebrew Association building at Spadina and Bloor.

In the final issue of last semester, the right person was named as winner of the photo contest. Unfortunately, the name was printed under the wrong picture. Today we present the winning photograph taken by Kelly Chow. Our apologies go out to Kelly and to Fred Weir whose name appeared under Kelly's photo. Our sincere apologies.

Wanted dead or alive: stolen Scar. quilts

By GEORGE COOK

Sometime between 8:30 and 9:30 pm on December 5 thieves made off with three quilts on display at Scarborough College. The quilts were part of an exhibition organized by artist Kim Ondaatje and had previously been seen in other centres across Canada.

"It was the last night of the show and the college was officially closed because of the snow storm," Scarborough College's public relations officer Charlotte Caton said.

There were very few people left in the building because of the inclement weather, Caton maintained. She explained that the quilts were wired to pegs on the wall and that "by pulling very hard" they could be torn down.

A $500 reward is being offered for information leading to the recovery of the quilts. This is about as much as they would bring on the hot quilt market, according to Caton.

"But it would be very difficult to sell them — they've been seen all across the country," she said.

A large sign has been hung over the college's central meeting place calling for the return of the quilts and promising that no questions will be asked.

The matter is being investigated by Metro police. At press time the quilts still hadn't been located.

SAC funds foreign Christmas holiday

By TOM KUHN

International students at U of T were spared a lonely Christmas holiday away from home by an international Christmas sponsored by the Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship and partially subsidized by the Students' Administrative Council (SAC).

Over 90 students, including 60 foreign students from Ontario universities met for the Fellowship's fourth international Christmas December 22 through December 27.

Students from about 20 countries such as Japan, Sweden, Philippines, Costa Rica, India, Pakistan, and Nigeria spent the vacation at the Ontario Pioneer Camp on Lake Clearwater south of Huntsville.

"The purpose of the International Christmas is principally to provide a traditional Christmas setting for those who can't go home for the holidays," said U of T student organizer Jim McCarthy.

"It tries to remedy the loneliness of the vacation period, as well as provide friendship and companionship for international students," McCarthy added. Organizers called the camp an immense success. Students participated in cross-country skiing, snowshoeing, and tobogganing among the outdoor activities. Traditional Christmas activities included cutting a Christmas tree from the brush, singing Christmas carols, and the production of various national plays.

"People do come back every year. It seems to fill a vital need of kids on campus. One student from Israel has gone for the last three years," McCarthy added.

U of T professor Kenneth Hare said that if there is an accident, it is best to have the waste deposited in an area of low population. "I don't think these wastes will ever escape."

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario

The honourable negotiators toast the success of a Middle East peace treaty.

A real solution

The recent meeting of President Carter and President Sadat in an airport lounge, underlined the fact that the problems in the Middle East now centre on a single issue: an independent homeland for the Palestinian people. The solution offered by the Israelis, that is, "home-rule" within borders controlled by Israeli troops, is no alternative because of the limitations it necessarily imposes upon real self-determination.

And President Carter's recent statements favouring the Israeli solutions must be seen as misguided attempts to forge a compromise between the major antagonists. Surely they are statements going against the founding principles of the United States — a country which had as its founding principle a haven of refuge for persecuted peoples.

Self-determination, as all Canadians now know, is a term that can be thrown about with a great deal of abandon, from the Treaty of Versailles to the Parti Quebecois' rhetoric. But there are few more legitimate claims than those of the Palestinians: a people wrested from their homes many years ago, and given no worthwhile place to go.

The claims are much the same as those made by the Zionists when they first proclaimed the Israeli state. Their lack of sympathy to the Palestinian problems is immoral. Surely we can understand their fears of aggression from a Palestinian state on the West Bank, but that fear would only be justifiable if the PLO represented the government in such a state. But it is this very fact to which Egypt is also opposed, so it seems that agreement on this point should not be difficult to reach.

The largest obstacle to a settlement now seems to be obstinate public opinion both in Israel and its allies, notably the United States. Surely both countries can look to their roots to find some sympathy for the Palestinian cause, both being founded by people seeking a home of their own, to govern with people of like beliefs.

The most important point that can be made here is the courage of Sadat. He is living dangerously by breaking even further than before with other Arab leaders. But he sees the Middle East problems as involving the legitimate claims of two different peoples, and that the solution would involve nothing less than a wholly independent state for each. Compromise. This can be the only real answer, the placation of a single side will merely prolong the very grave problems faced.

Ombudsman

In your article "Prof. takes action, slams sexism" (November 23) I am quoted as responding to the suggestion that a province-wide university ombudsman be appointed by describing such an official as an "outsider" to individual universities and stating that "the less outside interference there is, the better," this statement does not adequately convey my reaction to this proposal, and might give the impression that I believe universities should be a law unto themselves, which is not the case.

I am not certain that the evidence available to date suggests that many individuals have grievances against universities which cannot be fairly and adequately considered within the institutions themselves or through some other channels. In this regard it appears from your report that the case which prompted this suggestion has been the subject of investigation by an independent agency, the Human Rights Commission, and that the Commission's handling of the complaint may itself be subject to review by the Ontario Ombudsman.

Moreover, even if there is compelling evidence that universities are not providing adequate consideration and redress, where appropriate, for grievances, I am not convinced that the appointment of a province-wide ombudsman for universities alone is a logical remedy. There has been discussion of extending the jurisdiction of the Ontario Ombudsman to include post-secondary institutions, and this would appear to be a more sensible response.

As regards the merits of investigation by an "insider" rather than an "outsider", it has been my experience that grievances can most readily be resolved at or near their source, and I have found it a definite advantage to be familiar with the University and to function within the institution itself. However, if there is a choice between endorsing interference, from outside or inside, and tolerating serious injustices to individuals, I'll come down on the side of interference every time.

Dean's propagit

As a student member of the Faculty of Arts and Science General Committee I was dismayed, if not a little disgusted, by the fact that employees of the Faculty Office were distributing material entitled "Questions and Answers on the Erindale Curriculum" (copy enclosed) at the December 12th meeting of the General Committee. Although there is no authorship to this document (which is rather questionable in itself), it is fairly obvious that it was born under the penmanship of Dean Morton.

I would take no exception to the distribution by mail of this literature prior to the meeting as information Dean Morton wished to have distributed. But to have it handed out as one walked into the meeting which was to discuss and possibly vote on the Erindale program is unconscionable.

The entire meeting was rather farcical but something very important was being stated and should be given further exposure. Professor Finlayson spoke quite to the point by explaining that there were really two issues at question here — one being that of autonomy of a college to decide upon its own program, and the other being the question of a curriculum review throughout the entire faculty. While I personally am opposed to a structured program and find the New Program to be entirely supportable, I do understand that there are many members of the University who question the New Program and wish to see it reviewed. Surely, the time for review is before any curriculum decisions are made for Erindale College specifically. Where is the credibility of a University that could ultimately have two curriculum structures in a single faculty of Arts and Science, not to mention the separate structure for Scarborough College?

It seems to me that the proposal for the Erindale curriculum is only the tip of the iceberg. Let's hope this university doesn't go down like the Titanic.

Greenpeace seeks support

Award-winning film documents whale harvest

By RICHARD SMALL

Over 300 people turned up on the evening of December 14 to see the award-winning film "Greenpeace — Voyages to Save the Whales" at the Cinema Lumiere on College Street.

The 53-minute color documentary, using footage shot on the spot by expedition members, detailed the efforts of the Vancouver-based Greenpeace Foundation to halt Russian whaling activities in the North Pacific in the summers of 1975-76. The evening also featured slides of whales off Tadoussac on the lower St. Lawrence, accompanied by singer Terry Jones and the group Interspecies Music.

Michael Earle, spokesman for Greenpeace, admitted that the film, which won Canadian Film Awards in the Best Documentary Under Sixty Minutes and Best Sound Recording categories, had only been booked for a one-night stand in Toronto because the group "didn't really expect too many" people to show up. In fact, the theatre was packed to the point where almost 40 people sat on the floor in the narrow aisles. The group promised a second showing that night for the 30-odd enthusiasts who couldn't get in and braved the cold outside for over two hours after the initial performance began.

Earle cited the goals of the evening as fundraising and education. To this end, the foundation made available stacks of free literature at the door. A sales desk offered almost anything ranging from 50 cent whale buttons to $700 brass sperm whale sculptures, can only have made it overwhelmingly so.

Also available was material on the two other issues that complete Greenpeace's trio of deadly sins — nuclear power plants (mainly a concern of the Toronto branch) and the annual Newfoundland seal hunt, scheduled to begin next month. Earle promised that the group would again mount another dramatic anti-sealing campaign.

"Voyages to Save the Whales" revealed that since 1920, over two million whales have been killed, bringing five of the ten species to the threshold of possible extinction. Greenpeace efforts in the 1970's have been directed towards pressuring the International Whaling Commission (IWC) into adopting a ten-year moratorium on commercial whaling to allow for the recovery of whale populations.

The group charged that those countries still maintaining whaling fleets (notably the USSR and Japan, which account for 80 percent of the annual take) have not been respecting the quotas they agreed upon in the commission. As their whaling fleets are nearing obsolescence and would be uneconomical to replace, whaling countries are attempting to "harvest" as many whales as possible in the few years remaining. This policy spells out, in Earle's words, "the hell with the whales in the future."

The film provided concrete proof that a number of the whales taken were under the international 30-foot minimum length set by the IWC. It argued that the IWC's failure to deal with this overstepping of agreed limits on size and quantity proved it was "a front for the whaling companies."

The most dramatic scenes showed Greenpeace members in Zodiac inflatable rubber boats attempting to block the lines of sight between the Russian harpoon ships and the whales so that harpoons could not be fired without endangering the lives of the protesters.

In 1975, harpoons were fired within a few feet of the Zodiacs. In 1976, however, the whaling ships refused to fire or even aim their harpoons while Greenpeace members were in the area, allowing many whales to escape.

Through these confrontation tactics and the successful attempts of the whalers to remain hundreds of miles off the West Coast, Greenpeace claims to have saved — temporarily at least — almost 2,000 whales. Concerning those not so lucky, gruesome footage was provided of harpoon strikes and of blood gushing from portholes in the sides of the processing ships, which can process an entire whale carcass in half an hour.

However, the optimistic note on which "Voyages" ends, noting the relative success of the 1976 expedition as compared to that of the previous year, has been put into question by events of last summer, when Russian and Australian harpoons were fired at whales, dangerously close to Greenpeace Zodiacs.

Earle also revealed that the apparent success of conservation groups in gaining an overall quota reduction of more than 10,000 whales (35 percent of the annual take) from the IWC was undone in large part by the commission's subsequent reverse decision to raise the total quota by several thousand.

Sounds of silence

I am writing to you, on behalf of all the undergraduate students at the Faculty of Music to protest the proposed access route for the planned additions to the Royal Ontario Museum. As you know, the proposed route would cause a great deal of vehicular traffic through the green area immediately west of the Edward Johnson Building. While this intrusion would cause, albeit temporarily, great damage to the particularly beautiful area of the campus known as Philosophers' Walk, it would also cause untold hardships to both our building and its occupants.

First, the constant rumbling and rolling of great pieces of equipment past our west wall would create an almost unsurmountable disturbance to both the many offices on the west side of the building as well as to our classrooms, virtually all of which are located on the south side of the building, and have an unobstructed view of the area concerned.

The second and even more crucial problem is, of course, one of noise. Obviously, to our discipline, to our staff and students, sound is a vital issue at all times. We attempt, in our daily work, to create beautiful, organized sound, known as music. Hardly a course is taught in the building which does not involve significant amounts of listening; our lives are integrally involved with rehearsing, either individually or in groups. To have the relative peace and quiet of our building disrupted in such a way would be tantamount to making our daily operations impossible.

I would urge you most strongly to investigate other means of routing this equipment into the construction site. I trust that serious consideration will be given to our predicament and its solution.

Misquoted?

On seeing a copy of the Varsity of Monday November 21, I was surprised to see my name in the story "Four arrested at York".

Varsity news editor Ann Auman contacted me at home the night before, and asked if I could give her some information regarding the story of the arrests. I refused (because I did not feel I knew enough to give an accurate picture) and she asked if I would verify the information she did have.

This I agreed to, and was able to clear up at least one important misconception.

However, writer Peter Hohenadel, in his story attributes to me a statement that an armed CPC M-L member came to York to act as an enforcer on Friday November 18.

The statement was also attributed to a member of York's version of SAC. I told Ann that I understood he had said that. I did not make this statement myself, nor did I verify it.

Furthermore, I made it clear that of the four people arrested, one was a lecturer, and another a university staff member. Yet the Varsity story says three students were arrested. (As it turns out, no students were arrested.)

At any rate, I think the Varg is a good paper, but these little inaccuracies need to be pointed out. Now I know what it's like to be misquoted.

Gay rights

A letter from Ken Reimer Nov. 9 headed "Gay is Natural" commented on my speech to the Hart House Debates Society on the question of whether homosexual rights should be protected by law.

He understood from the coverage of the occasion in the Varsity that I argued that gay rights were to be protected because homosexuality was a perfectly natural thing, and as evidence for that statement cited incidences of homosexual behaviour among "birds and earthworms."

Reimer is quite right in finding that evidence insufficient. Unfortunately, the Varsity misrepresented my position somewhat by reporting as serious arguments what I had intended to be humorous additions only.

Gay rights must be protected by law because gay people are saying it is necessary, and because gay people are healthy, productive members of society.

For Reimer, it is a question of being "responsible to be a man or a woman." As I stated during the debate, it is precisely that grisly responsibility that gay liberation will free all of us from.

New journalism

I've watched with amusement the developments in the running battle between the Varsity and Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott. To my way of thinking, you blew it. And as a student in a professional faculty who views the proposed OSAP changes with some concern, I'm a little fed up with the Varsity editorial personnel.

I'm tired of puerile cartoons and photos playing on the avian homonym of Parrott's name. I'm tired of name-calling and personal jabs that obscure the very important and valid points that should be made in a lucid and convincing fashion in the Varsity's copy. Above all, I'm bored to tears by quasi-radical editorials that manage, God only knows how, to be strident and smug at the same time.

The issues here were too damned fundamental to be thrown away by this kind of petty journalism. If Parrott was going to be moved by anything, it would be reasoned and rational argument, not the distorted dialectics of your paper. Particularly laughable are the last lines in last Wednesday's editorial, (It won't work): "The encouraging thing is that Parrott's scared. If we scare him some more, he's likely to change his mind." What a weak attempt to rationalize your previous faux pas! All you did was underscore Parrott's growing and extremely regrettable tendency to ignore student input.

One final point concerning the publication of Parrott's letter to you. I'm sure he knew that headlining the letter "For your information only — not for publication" was in fact the best assurance possible that the Varsity, in knee-jerk fashion, would promptly publish it. By so doing, you immediately painted yourselves as unethical and antagonistic.

Just let me agree that December 22 was a lousy day for Parrott to come. I, for one, would have stayed to let him know what I thought of his policies. Thanks to your rag, I won't have that chance.

OUR NAME SAYS IT ALL

Second in a series. . .

Report from China: E

By David Brown

David Brown, a former student of Trinity College, is now studying ancient Chinese history at Nanking University in Central China. This is Brown's second year in China; last year he studied at the Peking Language Institute.

In this second in a series of articles sent from Nanking, Brown discusses changing educational policies in China, tracing the development of policy before and after the Cultural Revolution of 1966-1969.

Since the late 1960's a patch-work of regional systems has substituted for a national educational policy in China. Last October's purge of the gang of four prompted a new effort to develop a comprehensive national policy. Although a national conference on education has not yet been convened, a conference on university admission policy was held in September. On October 21, Chinese newspapers reported on the conference, and one day later published an interview with education officials detailing the new admission system. (See box below). In essence the new policy incorporates major elements of the pre-Cultural revolution system, and represents the most decisive modification to date of some educational experiments associated with the Cultural Revolution.

"EDUCATED YOUTHS"

During the early years of the Cultural Revolution schools at all levels were closed for some period of time. Universities were the last to be reopened, and since 1972 a make-shift admissions policy has been in effect. Until the present, graduating high school students were assigned to work in the countryside or at factories. Known as "educated youths," these students had to work at least two years before becoming eligible for tertiary education. In fact, most worked for three or four years in the countryside, and many who graduated just at the start of the Cultural Revolution spent up to seven years at their work unit.

Entrance to university was based on a three-stage process dubbed "three-level selection, leadership approval and university selection." After the mandatory two years of work, an educated youth could apply for admission to university. Local registration stations were set up in August, and students would submit their names for review. For example, an educated youth in the countryside would have his application reviewed in turn by his production team, brigade and commune.

"NO STANDARD SYSTEM"

Before the commune made a final decision, applicants had to write a short essay, the topic of which varied from place to place, and time to time, according to prevailing political winds. One student admitted to university in 1975 wrote on the "Study the Theory of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat" campaign, combining theoretical discussion with personal work and political experience. Normally only this one essay was required of the student. If the essay demonstrated the political and academic competence of the student, the commune would support his application. All applications were then collected at the county-ward level, and a final selection was made by the universities. No standard system of evaluation was used to evaluate applicants, universities relying on some consideration of political and academic qualities. The entire procedure from application to selection usually took two months, with the term starting in October. Regional variations were so widespread however, that no overall generalization can really be made.

Provincial governments bore most of the costs of education. Tuition and board were provided by the government. Students received a monthly stipend of $10, plus grain and cotton rations. Families often sent supplementary allowances to sons or daughters. Educated youths who were former state employees

(i.e. worked in state-owned factories or administrative units), and who had at least five years work experience did not receive this stipend. Instead their work units continued to pay their former wages, and after graduating these students would return to their work units.

THE NEW SYSTEM

Now the government has introduced four major changes into the system. Undoubtedly the reintroduction of a standard entrance examination stands as the most important change. Attacked as one of the foundations of Liu Shao-chi's "revisionist" educational system, entrance exams were criticized for selecting a group of youths weighted heavily in favor of youths from "bourgeois," urban background. When universities were reopened in 1971 and 1972, the State Council indicated a new entrance examination would be established. Apparently this touched off intense and hurried preparations by high school students in anticipation of the exams, but the proposal was lost in the political fighting of the day. No such indecision exists today, however, and universities will select students primarily on the basis on exam results.

Provincial governments are now responsible for setting the entrance examinations for all tertiary institutions under their jurisdiction.

Factory work was a prerequisite Counties and city wards will administer the exams. Students may sit for either the arts or the science exam. Both exams include papers in politics, language and literature, and mathematics. Arts students will be further tested in history and geography, and science students in physics and chemistry. Those wanting to specialize in foreign languages must write a special language exam, in addition to the

Balancing morals, knowledge and M

On the 21st of October, 1977, the Chinese Ministry of Education announced that a high level meeting had been held in September to decide on the new regulations for entrance to universities and higher level technical institutes. On October 23, both national newspapers published an interview between ministry officials and Chinese reporters. That the regulations should be explained by an interview, a format rarely seen in Chinese papers, reflects the significance of the new admission system. As an aide to understanding current changes in Chinese educational policy, the interview is translated in full below.

This year marks the first time students will be admitted to higher level institutes since the smashing of the Gang of Four. The intent, conditions and method of admission have thus undergone many changes. Below, officials from the Ministry of Education answer our reporters' questions.

Q: What important changes have been made for the general admission of students to universities this year?

A: This year marks the first time students have been admitted to university since the successful completion of the Cultural Revolution (tr. the Cultural Revolution was officially declared ended at the 11th Party Congress in August). The historically significant 11th Party Congress has given us new tasks, and by the end of the century we wish to construct a modern, strong socialist country. Therefore, we urgently need to cultivate and develop all types of talents which are both "red" and "expert". The proper admission of students constitutes an important part of this task. To guarantee the quality of new students this year, with the exception of the "from the commune, back to the commune" students, a system of standard admission and distribution of students will be implemented. Under a policy of balancing morals, knowledge and health, and selecting those students with superior results, students may voluntarily enter their names for a standardized examination. Cities and local districts will hold the exams, universities shall select successful candidates, and these selections will be subject to provincial approval.

In order to open the exams to a wider range of talented students, in addition to the worker-peasant educated youths, students from the current graduating high school class may be chosen for direct entrance to university.

University entrance will be based on the results of a standard examination. The exams will seek to establish the student's grasp of fundamental knowledge, and his analytic abilities. The Gang of Four severely damaged the system of standard exams. Shortly after the State Council released the policy paper on examinations in 1973, the Gang threw out the noxious example of Zhang Tie-sheng, the student who handed in a blank examination paper. They also termed examinations evidence of the restoration of capitalism, and reversing the tide of the Cultural Revolution. Their actions had disastrous results on the admission of talented students to university. We must continue to criticize these crimes they perpetrated, distinguish which line is good and which is bad, and diligently work for a successful implementation of the examination system.

Q: What qualifications must one have to apply to write the exam?

A: All educated youth in industry and agriculture (including those remaining in the cities or who have not yet been assigned work),

Only entrance exams will count for university admission.

demobilized soldiers or cadres, and this year's graduates from high school must be unmarried and between the ages of 20 and 25 if they wish to sit for the exam. Those who have demonstrated research aptitude, or have substantial research experience, may be of up to 30 years of age, and marital status will not be considered. (This applies in particular to those who graduated from high school in 1966 and 1967.)

The following conditions must also be met:

1. Clear political history, must support the Communist Party, like manual labor, observe revolutionary rules, and determinedly work for the revolution.
2. Must be a high school graduate, or have equivalent qualifications.
3. Must be in good health.

Q: May students in their senior years of high school also apply to write?

A: High school students in their senior years (that is those who have not yet graduated), may apply if their marks are superior, and already have the equivalent cultural level of a high school graduate. Their application must be accompanied by a letter of recommendation from their school.

Q: What method of application will be used for special schools, such as those to military cadres, fine arts, physical education, etc.?

A: For military cadres and soldiers wanting to go to regional schools, they must follow the special rules decided upon by the General Political Department of the PLA.

The Ministry of Culture and the National Sports Committee will issue special rules for admission to fine arts and physical education institutes.

Q: What subject areas will candidates be tested in?

A: Candidates may write either the arts, or the science examination.

Subjects tested on the arts exam include: politics, language and literature, mathematics, history and geography. The science exam covers: politics, language and literature, mathematics, physics and chemistry. Those applying for foreign language exams, must write a supplementary Provincial educational committees will administer the exams at county-ward levels will administer the exams.

Q: Will special provision be made for successful students to receive financial assistance to travel to university?

A: Successful students who are state employees will be provided with stipend by their current unit. Other students should apply to the appropriate stipend. Only travel fare will be provided. Responsibility for food, lodging, and baggage will be borne by the student.

Q: Has any provision been made for students who are not successful in university?

A: Successful candidates who are state employees will receive living allowances and be issued by their former work unit. Upon graduation they will return to their former units.

Starting this year, all other students will receive allowances from a national fund.

Q: What will the enrollment procedure be for the commune students?

A: Currently our country has two systems of education: the urban system and the collective. To support the modernization of agriculture, the communes have been designed to offer students the "from the commune, back to the commune" system.

Hereafter such institutes should more agriculture. Students will be selected by the commune, and will be made for age and culture.

Q: After graduation, how will students be distributed?

A: Upon graduation from university, ex-commune students will be distributed back to the commune. Students, work units will be distributed back to the commune.

national distribution plan. Provincial governments will be responsible for the distribution of students studying in the provinces. If required, the national government will be responsible for the distribution of graduates to other areas.

Q: What is the correct treatment of entrance exams?

A: Presently many young people are attending university. This is a good thing. However, the capacity to admit a large number of students is limited.

Those who are not admitted to university should continue to work in the countryside, or work at a factory. Great contributions to socialist construction can be made in these positions.

general arts exam. Exams were held at the end of 1977.

EXAMS IMPORTANT

Two major changes have been made in the application procedure. Students are no longer required to have at least two years work experience. Also, those just graduating from high school may now go directly to university. In fact the government intends to select 20-30 per cent of new students from this group. (Previously some students did go directly to university, but they represented a very small fraction of the total.) Moreover, the new regulations provide for the direct admission of exceptional students in their senior years of high school. An average candidate's age of 20 is desired, but older students with outstanding research or work experience may apply. As before, candidates must apply through their work units, but as long as they meet age and academic requirements, they may sit for the examinations and a larger, younger group of students may now apply.

The new policy does not substantially change the current financial system. However, a national fund will be set up to assist needy students, and it appears more of the costs of education will be borne by those families who can afford to support their children. Also, students who must travel long distances to reach university will be eligible for travel stipends.

SOCIAL DISCONTENT

All these changes touch upon problems which the Cultural Revolution attempted to answer in different ways. In a candidness uncharacteristic of Chinese newspapers, the interview with education officials dealt with the question of educated youth currently working in the countryside and factories. Chinese universities do not have the capacity to absorb more than a handful of the students waiting to come back from the countryside. With more students going directly from high school to university, places available for educated youth will be relatively fewer. Social discontent arising from the sudden disappointment of educated youths' expectations constitutes one of the most potentially serious social problems facing the government. To mitigate the effects of the change, a transitional approach evidently has been selected with an upper limit of 30 per cent on direct admissions to university. Given the current emphasis on technical skills and "coherency" in study, this quota will probably be raised every year until the vast majority of students once again go directly from high school to university.

Not only are positions open to educated youth now reduced, but a selection process based on a standard examination further weakens their competitive position. In general, students just graduating from high school would have an advantage over educated youths who have been working in the countryside for two or more years. Regional variations in the "down to the countryside" (educated youths sent to learn from peasants) programme will influence relative competitive positions. Last June we (foreign students) visited some educated youths working on a commune just outside Peking. All had graduated from the Peking Foreign Language Institute high school, and were expecting to continue their language studies after leaving the commune. With their former school only a 20 minute bike ride away, able to receive the latest language tests, and having a large amount of time to study, these students stood in an even stronger position than after graduating from high school. In contrast, last spring I read a poster in Shanghai written by students who had been sent to Heilongjiang after high school. They complained they were isolated and had no opportunity to keep abreast of their studies. A standardized examination system will therefore have substantially different effects on groups of educated youths.

WORK MADE RELEVANT

In addition to affecting educated youth currently in the countryside, and the future of the "down to the countryside" program, a reassessment of the "open-door schooling" system will probably shortly follow. While the new regulations reaffirm the position of periodic manual labor during the study term, the emphasis on greater attention to study will affect "open-door schooling" in two ways. Whereas university students previously spent time in both the countryside and factories during school terms, more attention is now being paid to making the work experience immediately relevant to the students' study. Take the case of a history student at Nanking University. His class was first sent to the countryside for several weeks of labor, and the next term to a factory. In the countryside they worked near the site of an old landlord's compound where, in addition to manual labor, they investigated the history of land tenure in the area. Their time at the factory on the other hand, had no connection with their studies. But a period of labor in a factory was required of them, so they went. If indeed "open-door schooling" remains part of the university curriculum, a closer connection will be made with courses of study. Further, the length of each work period will probably be reduced. A second year class at Nanking University recently objected to nine weeks of manual labor, arguing it unduly interfered with their studies. As a result the period was shortened to six weeks.

UPGRADING AND DIVERSIFICATION

Riding into Peking just after "liberation" (1949) Chinahand William Hinton remarked that it appeared the countryside had invaded the city. In many ways the Cultural Revolution marked an attempt to restore this direction back into the dynamics of Chinese development. Tertiary education before the Cultural Revolution was decidedly urban-biased, and the new admission regulations reflect a partial return to that position. One would be unjustified in terming it a total reversion to the past, for some institutions developed during the Cultural Revolution have been strengthened by the new policy. Special tertiary institutes designed to raise the technical level of agriculture admit "from the commune, back to the commune" students. For the most part these are students of peasant origin who return to their communes after study. The new regulations call for a widening of the base from which these students are selected, as well as an upgrading and diversification of technical subjects taught at these institutes.

While perhaps more well suited for a rapid modernization of agriculture, nonetheless the new regulations effectively check any move toward homogeneity between rural and urban student bodies. Universities will increasingly draw on urban students, moreover, on urban students without work experience in the countryside, while special technical institutes train peasant students for future work in their communes. Chinese leaders appear to believe that a narrowing of the gap between city and countryside will occur in the course of an overall modernization of the economy. In terms of this strategy, a more distinct division in tertiary education between rural and urban may indeed be an effective means to achieve the long-term goal.

Did comets bring life here?

By CAROLYN CLINK

"I don't know whether it is nonsense or not," Sir Fred Hoyle said about his theory which states that life on earth originated from comets.

Hoyle, noted British astronomer and writer, was in Toronto the first week of December to deliver three lectures at the U of T concerning his controversial theories on astronomy and physics.

Hoyle based his comet theory on the discovery of cellulose molecules in the dark clouds of nebulae. Since life on Earth is 50 percent cellulose, according to Hoyle, it is possible that the molecules came to Earth via comets.

Hoyle feels that the earth's original water was also supplied by comets. Comets with their ice cores, upon impact with the earth, would release water vapor, and eventually form an atmosphere.

Hoyle's life-carrying comets would need an atmosphere to cushion them to a soft "ten-meters-per-second" landing in order to survive. They carry the molecules in a "warm little pond" at the core, protected by a skin "a few hundred metres thick" of organic material.

When the comet landed softly on Earth, the organic molecules would either adapt from their anaerobic origins to the aerobic Earth, or die.

Hoyle maintained that this transfer still occurs today, and cited bacteria and viruses that are "far too virulent for their own survival."

"The Greeks and Romans did not know small pox," Hoyle said. It and other "recent" viruses have not settled into a symbiotic relationship with the host. Older viruses, like the common cold, are not deadly, he explained.

Hoyle pointed to the influenza epidemic of 1918-1919 as a possible recent transfer. The influenza was found to be incommunicable, and the first cases appeared in different parts of the world. Hoyle also claimed that we depend on these invasions for biological change.

In another lecture Hoyle explained how comets could have caused ice ages. The earth, by passing through the halo of a comet, could acquire a layer of particles dense enough to cut off most of the incident sunlight, while allowing radiation to escape.

The particles would take from one to 10 years to settle through the atmosphere and down to the ground. During this time, the Earth would be cooling into a frozen mass. Hoyle calculated that the latent heat of the oceans would only last 10 years, and then the Earth would freeze over completely.

Nuclear Energy

In another lecture Hoyle described the dangers of not changing to nuclear fuel.

"If nothing comes to replace coal and oil, the world will come under the political influence of the Soviet Union," Hoyle claimed. He produced statistics to show that most of the world's oil reserves are under Soviet control.

Hoyle also used statistics to prove the safety of nuclear power plants, and weighed the merits of the different reactors.

"The amount of waste that is involved is quite small compared to the fuel itself," Hoyle pointed out. If all the nuclear waste were dumped into the sea, the radiation level of one bucket of that seawater would equal the radiation level of one bucket of our present day soil, he argued.

Hoyle showed how economically our energy expenditure is directly related to our prosperity. Conservation is not viable, and "only the rich can afford to speak about conservation," Hoyle said.

WE'RE BACK!

We hope you enjoyed your holidays. SAC looks forward to a very exciting second term. A number of activities are lined up in response to the good (and bad) feed-back we got from you during the first term.

Here's a partial list of what we have in store:

- Campus As Campus Centre: A significant victory was won this past term when the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council of the U of T exempted lounge space from the no-net cost principle. SAC will continue its work to make sure that the project moves ahead as quickly as possible.
- Radio Varsity: After being idle for two years, the St. George campus-based radio station will begin limited programming on an experimental basis this month.
- Guest Speaker Dr. Wilson Key: Dr. Key will be appearing at Convocation Hall on January 18th. Do you know what motivates you when you buy something? Dr. Key says he knows.
- Project Aid: The deadline for applications is January 10th. Be sure to pick up a set of guidelines at the SAC office.
- SAC's Free Film Series: How's this for a lineup of stars and films? Marilyn Monroe, Humphrey Bogart, Woody Allen, Marlon Brando, 2001 and the Pink Panther? Pick up a Cinema Gratis Film Schedule at any SAC location.
- Folk Series: Coming on January 12th is Mirth at Erindale College and Innis Town Hall. Also appearing in January will be Barde, at Convocation Hall.
- 1977-78 Directory: Contains the names, addresses and telephone numbers of students at the U of T. A must for only 50¢ at all SAC outlets.
- Fees Referendum: Students at the U of T pay the second lowest student fee in Ontario. Following a full presentation of recommendations from the Finance Commission, the SAC Board of Directors will work out a referendum to be presented to you for your decision in the spring.
- Employment Panel: SAC and GSU (Graduate Students' Union) have invited each of the three federal party leaders to discuss his party's policies with respect to the unemployment problem.
- Ski Days: Avoid long weekend line ups: come skiing weekdays with SAC. Save 50% on tow rates, 50% on regular rental rates and 75% on lessons. Schedules available.
- Roam Around: The first biggie of the new term is slated for January 27th.
- SAC Offices, Information Desks and Ticket Outlets: Con Hall tickets, free copies of Campus Week, film and ski schedules, your copy of the Directory and Ski Day tickets are all available at 12 Hart House, Sid Smith, Erindale College, Scarborough College and the Faculty of Dentistry.
- The Sex-Ed Centre: New hours are 11 to 3 Monday to Friday and 5 to 7 Tuesday and Wednesday.
- External Review of the Governing Council: SAC will be working to make sure that changes recommended in Council procedures and composition are of benefit to you, the students of this university.
- Grading-Practices Policy: SAC will be looking for a revision in the University's current grading-practices policy, which will make it more equitable.
- Student Aid: SAC will continue its efforts to work towards a more effective Student Aid package. If you are interested in helping, get in touch with the U of T Student Aid Committee through SAC.
- Breaking New Ground: Would you like a student arbitration service, a full time pub? Other universities have them. SAC plans to look into these possibilities for you.

For further information on any of these activities or other SAC plans, visit the SAC offices and information desks, talk with your SAC Rep (a list of Board of Directors can be found in the Directory) and read SAC's Campsu Week. And don't forget the SAC Page in the Varsity every Wednesday.

Best of luck in the coming term.

Dupre explains OCUA history and future

By ALAN STEWART

The Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA) has neglected the problems surrounding tuition fees and student aid, said U of T Professor Stefan Dupre, the council's chairman in its first three years of existence.

OCUA, which has acted as the official independent advisory body to the Ontario government since 1974, "by its silence, has not affected government policy in the area of tuition fees," said Dupre. In addition, "student assistance is not on Council's plate." Although Dupre has advised the government in that area as well.

The council, comprising university, business, labor, student and community representatives, recommends short and long-term policies on the amount and allocation of funding among universities, he explained.

Dupre pointed out the structural factors enabling OCUA to give independent advice despite the government's control over the council's composition and funding.

"Once the people are appointed, they're expected to give the government the best advice they can," Dupre said. He noted that Civil servants do not help to formulate advice, thus eliminating one possible source of pressure to comply with existing policy.

In its first year of operation, the council adopted the government's stated objectives with respect to university financing: "To offset inflationary trends, to maintain or improve existing levels of service and to accommodate predicted enrolment increases."

"In a way," Dupre noted, "government policy influenced the council." The council then "costed" the measures necessary to fulfill the stated government objectives and demonstrated that their spending targets are not sufficiently high to meet these objectives.

In its second year, inflationary pressures induced OCUA to substitute "maintain" for "maintain or improve" in the objectives and to recommend that the government formally adopt these objectives for itself.

The council adopted the amended formulation of basic policy for its recommendations in the absence of official Government guidelines.

The 1976-77 Council reflected on the possibility of enrolment shortfalls. They may occur, in the words of the council, because "fall in the income and status rewards... associated with university training" leads potential students to "forego university attendance as a route to career employment."

But student organizations have argued that inadequate government assistance to students is a more important cause of possible enrolment shortfalls.

Dupre noted that early childhood orientations to education and the tendency to steer low-income students away from university education may prove a greater barrier to accessibility than that of inadequate student assistance. Student assistance programs can be tailored so that financial problems are not the most significant factor leading to lower enrolment, he said.

Side Line By-Line

By JIM O'LEARY

While most of us were busy with our exams, members of the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) were trying to pass a motion which would undermine the athletic program of the U of T and other large universities.

At their annual meeting in Ottawa, a motion to lower CIAU eligibility from five to four years passed by a 22-17 vote but fell four votes short of the required 26 vote majority. Undaunted, John McConachie, CIAU assistant director, was quoted as saying that the vote in favour of lowering eligibility has been gaining momentum over the last few years, "and is going to come back at our next meeting in June."

The motion was presented by Father George Kehoe of St. Francis Xavier University who hoped to limit eligibility so that all universities could compete on an equal footing. At present, a large number of CIAU members do not have graduate programs at their schools which means that they have far fewer athletes to choose from when selecting their teams. Lack of graduate programs is particularly acute on the East Coast which makes it difficult for these schools to compete for national championships.

The question then becomes, should the U of T be expected to be competitive when playing schools that are much smaller? And should the U of T be expected to sacrifice their own programs to keep these small schools happy?

If smaller schools feel they cannot be competitive with other CIAU members, they should get out and form their own league.

The problem though is, that the latest vote shows that eligibility restrictions are supported by most universities. It seems likely that in the near future the proponents of change will sway the four votes they need to institute change.

If this should happen the Department of Athletics at the U of T owes it to their students to stand up and fight for their rights. Graduate students are fee-paying members of the university like anyone else. As such they have the right to compete in any intercollegiate event.

If the CIAU adopts the four year eligibility, the U of T should investigate alternatives to competing in the CIAU. Athletics at this university were conducted successfully long before the formation of a national governing body. It seems likely that the U of T could get along just fine without the CIAU meddling in their programs.

Other large universities would also be affected and could likely be persuaded to join the U of T in forming an independent league. In many ways such a league could prove to be better than the present formation.

In Ontario alone support could probably be found from Western, York, Queen's, Windsor and McMaster. All these schools have formed strong athletic programs and owe it to their students to not let their programs be altered by a bunch of smaller universities from across the country.

The CIAU may be doomed even without this one issue. It has reached the point that a number of small schools have attained enough power to limit the growth and improvement of the minority larger institutions in the country. These small schools have taken the attitude that they will never be as good as the larger schools so instead they are intent on sabotaging the programs of the larger universities. This situation will not be tolerated indefinitely by schools like Toronto. Eventually they will realize that the CIAU needs them more than they need the CIAU and will pull out.

If this should happen it is likely that the CIAU will, at the least, lose the prestigious position it holds in Canada or at the worst it will fold.

Cindy Is Canada's Best

By JIM O'LEARY

Scarborough College student Cindy Nicholas has been voted Canada's top female athlete of 1977 for her unprecedented two-way swim of the English Channel. The twenty-hour swim marked the first time a woman has ever made the double crossing.

For Nicholas the award marked the culmination of 15 years of work in which she has trained up to four hours daily in the off season and up to six hours in the summer.

Nicholas, who has now swum the channel five times and holds the record for the France to England crossing, was mildly disappointed that she missed setting the England to France record by a mere two minutes. If conditions are right she will try to break this record in August when she attempts the channel for a record breaking sixth time.

At no point did Nicholas feel tired enough to abandon her award winning swim despite a rocky landing at the midway point on the French coast. Strong waves propelled Nicholas onto the rocks and pinned her there for about 10 minutes. As she entered the water for her return swim to England, her body was covered with cuts and bruises which were to remain for over a month.

Though the award was no surprise to Nicholas, she still felt it was "a great honor to receive it" but felt the occasion was dampened by the fact "I was in the middle of exams and did not have a chance to celebrate." Nicholas studies chemistry and biology but someday hopes to enter law school in Toronto. She will receive her award at the Sports Celebrities Dinner on February 9.

Cindy Nicholas.

Blues No. 1 In Canada

As the Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) enters the second half of its hockey schedule, the U of T Blues find themselves comfortably in first place and at the top of the national rankings. The Blues are undefeated after their first nine games with eight wins and one tie.

Their success to date has been the result of a potent offence. They are averaging over nine points per game and unsurprisingly have eight players in the top ten scorers in the eastern Division of the OUAA.

The biggest surprise to date has not been the success of the Blues however, but rather the slow start of the York Yeomen. The Yeomen are three and three and have not been scoring like they have in the past. They lost a number of scorers from last year's team and have not found adequate replacements.

Gymnasts Ready For New Season

By CHESTER MAKISCHUK

The men's gymnastic team kicked off the current season with a successful holiday meet against York. Headed by Simon Smith, a finalist at last year's Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) championships, the Blues displayed excellent form and technique for their first meet of the year. What was originally scheduled as a tri-meet ended up as a dual meet between York and Toronto after Western got snowed in.

Both York and Toronto were without one of their main competitors. York's Marc Epprecht was touring China with the National team while U of T's, Guy Bourbeau was burdened with exams.

Although the Blues lost to the Yeomen, coach Chester Makischuk feels the small margin of victory (six points) will definitely be narrowed as the year progresses. Derek Wulf has been training extremely well since the season started and is a definite asset to this year's team. Willy Evans dazzled the small crowd at the meet with his fine execution on the parallel bars.

The next big meet for the gymnastic Blues will be on January 7 when York holds a large invitational meet. As well as representatives from the universities, members of Canada's Junior National Team will compete along with the University of Northern Michigan. It should be quite an interesting competition for the gymnasts and the spectators alike.

Everyone is welcome to attend. The location is York's Tait Mackenzie Building at 6:00 p.m.

Doug Caines has been harassing opposition goalies all season.

Gov. Con. shake-up

By CONNIE FILLETTI

Radical changes within the structure of Governing Council are due if recommendations contained in the External Review of the council's performance of the past five years are adopted.

The recommendations were revealed in a photocopy of the report obtained by The Varsity prior to its official release scheduled for January 9 in The Bulletin, the administration's newspaper.

Jack McDonald, past Executive Director of the Council on Ontario Universities (COU) and author of the report, recommends that three standing committees replace the five existing ones. Planning and Priorities would merge with Academic Affairs to become a Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning while the Internal and External Committees would jointly become a Committee on Campus and Community Affairs. The Business Affairs Committee would retain its present status.

The Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning would be the most powerful of the three. Furthermore, only seven of its 61 members would be students drawn from Governing Council. Of the 54 remaining members, McDonald proposes that 26 be drawn from teaching staff.

Brian O'Riordan, Students' Administrative Council (SAC) University Government Commissioner, charged that a 61-member committee is not workable as a legislative body. He also is concerned with the "token representation" given to students in the recommendations. O'Riordan said that despite all claims in the report it doesn't matter how many students are on the committee, the same should apply to faculty membership.

"It seems peculiar that he (McDonald) puts emphasis on teaching staff membership. There are issues where fundamental differences arise between estates and the student estate would like to feel that it is being listened to. If you're arguing from a numerically inferior position your argument is weakened," O'Riordan stressed.

McDonald advises that no change be made in the representational composition of Governing Council. O'Riordan describes this as an "incredible slap in the face of students" if McDonald is rejecting a 1974 Governing Council proposal whereby students would have 11 members, teaching staff 13, and 18 government appointees.

Among the other recommendations in the review, McDonald proposes that all Governing Council meetings be open, "subject to the Governing Council's conventions covering openness." At present, meetings of the executive and the Audit and Finance Subcommittee and certain other subcommittees are closed to the public.

A major change proposed in the review is that of majorities on standing committees of the council. According to the U of T Act by-law of 1972, no estate was allowed to have a majority on any standing committee. McDonald recommends that the Governing Council "rescind its requirement" to allow for a majority vote by any university estate.

McDonald's report details what power he recommends the committees should have. His suggested terms of reference for all three place them in advisory roles. They would "monitor" and "review and advise" the council on various issues. The balance of power would be shifted to the president of the university.

John Evans, current president of U of T, refused comment on this and other aspects of the external review as did McDonald until official publication of the report on Monday.

O'Riordan said removing power from the committees does not address concerns expressed about an already overly centralized administration. He claims McDonald has set up an even larger bureaucracy. O'Riordan fears Governing Council would become "almost invisible" and couldn't function properly as a governing body because of the lack of power.

"The external review is definitely a knock against students," O'Riordan said. "McDonald is kowtowing to the position adopted by some members of the administration and the faculty association in the past and present."

The report and its recommendations will be discussed in closed session by the Governing Council executive next Tuesday and will come before full session on January 19.

Finally -- Parrott to face U of T students' questions

By HEATHER HILL

After numerous invitations on the part of the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) to come to the U of T campus to talk to students about Ontario's new loan plan, Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, will be speaking at U of T next Thursday.

Parrott, who had earlier proposed December 22, 1977, as the date for his visit here — which SAC president John Tuzyk told him was inappropriate — informed the student council on Wednesday through his office of the new date.

The format of the meeting, which Tuzyk said would be determined by SAC, "will definitely involve a question and answer session." The details of the talk will be finalized with the minister's office on Monday, Tuzyk said. The meeting, which takes place at 4:00 p.m. in the Medical Sciences auditorium, should last "at least an hour and a half."

In preparation for the meeting, the student council held preliminary meetings with the Graduate Students' Union yesterday and an emergency meeting of the U of T

Student Aid Committee is taking place today.

Tuzyk said he expects a number of controversial points about the new Ontario Student Assistant Program (OSAP) to be raised during the question and answer session. They include:

- At the public hearings last fall, Parrott stated that the entire plan, including the rate of parental contribution and the "grandfather clause," would be ready by Jan. 1. However, executive assistant to the Minister Carol Vaughn confirmed Wednesday that the whole package wouldn't be ready until mid-April. And it is still unclear, according to Tuzyk, whether the delay in processing will hold up cheques to students next September.

- The delay may also mean that high school counsellors and students themselves will be unaware of the details in the plan when they go about applying for student aid.

- The U of T meeting could also confirm publicly the nature of the grandfather clause in the plan. At present, students who have completed four years of schooling are ineligible for the grant portion of the loan.

Tuzyk commented that he's "very happy that he (Parrott) is coming after our continuous efforts" and added that "it's now up to the students to use this opportunity to have an effect on the plan in a positive way."

Evans dismisses Yale chance keeps Liberals' hopes alive

By KATHY CANTY

After U of T President John Evans rejected the possibility of becoming president of Yale University, speculation has risen about the prospect of Evans running as a Liberal candidate in the next federal election.

Evans continues to say, however, that he has not decided what he will do when he finishes his term here on June 30. He could not consider the presidency of Yale because of his present commitments, Evans said vaguely. The federal Task Force on National Unity will occupy him for a short time after he leaves his post at U of T, he added.

Yale included him in their search for a new president as a "token representative of the emerging nation," quipped Evans. The approach from Yale was a very informal one, he stressed.

According to William Bundy, chairman of the Presidential Search Committee of Yale University, "at no time was Dr. Evans offered the presidency of Yale." He was asked if he "would consent to being considered," which is "normal procedure in university searches." Evans was approached because "we thought he was an outstandingly successful university president," said Bundy. The search committee looked all over Europe and North America, and Evans was one of the people who stood out, he added.

The man finally chosen for the job was one of the highest candidates on the list, said Bundy. He is a Yale professor of English, Bartlett Giamatti.

With the position at Yale out of the way, Liberal politicians remain optimistic that Evans will join their ranks. According to Keith Davey, National Campaign Chairman for the Liberal Party, Evans is "quite an attractive candidate for any party." He is "an intelligent guy" who is "concerned about the country."

Davey said that a number of riding associations in Toronto are interested in having Evans as their candidate. But none of them have yet made a formal approach.

"There is great hope that he will run in the next election," said Heather Peterson, Vice Chairman of the Campaign Committee for the Liberal party. There have been discussions with Evans "about the possibility of running," she added.

Profs slam Soviet anti-semitism

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

A recent petition, initiated by three top U of T professors, declaring that "Anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union is at a dangerous stage" has received unqualified support from 10 senior Jewish professors here.

A statement released Tuesday supports the stand of professors Bernard Etkin, Arthur Kruger and Frederick Lowy that Jewish professors have a special responsibility to give leadership in the battle against anti-semitism.

Philosophy Professor Emil Fackenheim, Law Professor M. L.

Friedland, Engineering Professor I. I. Glass, Computer Science Professor Kelly Gottlieb, Mathematics Professor Israel Halperin, Meds Professor C. H. Hollenberg, Hispanic Studies Professor Kurt Levy, Political Economy, Professor Noah Meltz, Social Work Professor Albert Rose and Medical Genetics Professor Louis Siminovich all applaud the initiative of their three colleagues without reservations. Although all these people hold very senior academic-administrative positions in their respective departments, they have all signed the statement simply as "professor."

"The views expounded by the committee have been sympathetically understood by three of Canada's leading clergymen," according to the statement. In a letter sent to all members of Parliament and Senate, support by all Canadians has been urged by the former Moderator of the United Church of Canada and present Chancellor of the University of Toronto Arthur Moore, the Archbishop of Toronto Philip F. Pocock, and the Primate of the Anglican Church of Canada Edward W. Scott.

Correction

In The Varsity of January 4th it was reported that U of T Professor J. S. Dupre had said that the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA) had "neglected" the issues of tuition fees and student aid. In fact, Prof. Dupre did not suggest that the council's silence on tuition fees was a case of "neglect," and he pointed out that other bodies have the responsibility of advising the government on student assistance. The Varsity regrets any embarrassment caused by the error.

Funds for chairs minimal, says Sword

By PETER HOENADEL

The acquisition of new academic chairs is becoming increasingly rare in Canadian universities according to Jack Sword, Special Assistant to the President. "They have never been common in Canada," Sword said, because of the prohibitively high cost.

Academic chairs are financed by an endowment to the university. The endowment must now amount to no less than $500,000 according to Sword. The money is held in trust by the university and the interest is used to support the work of a department head and his support staff. Unfortunately, funding a chair by earnings from bank interest relies "to some extent on speculation," according to Sword. The recently re-established Department of Hungarian Studies took five years of fund-raising by members and supporters of the Szecsenyi Society, according to Joseph Hemvas, co-chairman of the society. Donations solicited from all over the world amounted to $300,000. This amount was then matched by the federal government, yielding a total endowment of $600,000.

Another academic chair, sponsored by the Abitibi Corporation, was abandoned in 1969 after 13 years of financial support. Abitibi donated $10,000 annually to support a graduate program in silviculture. According to Professor J. L. Farrar, of the Department of Forestry and Landscape Architecture, the forestry industry "was coming on hard times" in the late sixties. As a result, Abitibi withdrew their commitment and used the money to provide scholarships for the children of their employees.

A recent gift of one million dollars given to U of T through the Update program will be used to establish a chair in Surgery, according to Sword. This particularly large endowment will be needed to finance the technical costs associated with a Department of Surgery. U of T's longest running academic chair, the Eaton Chair in Medicine, has been in existence for 30 years.

Landscapers go to Keswick

About 30 third-year landscape architecture students from U of T are working with the community of Keswick near Lake Simcoe on a project to resolve landscape problems in the town's land use decisions.

The Keswick Community Plan, begun late last September, uses community participation for the first time in the landscape architecture program. According to Project member Karen Anthony, the students want to investigate creative landscape planning in a semi-rural region in order to offer the Township of Georgina a fresh viewpoint to the problems of public access and residential and commercial development.

The students examined the economic, social and political implications underlying these decisions. They considered housing, energy needs, wildlife conservation, transportation, and renewable resources in their recommendations to the town's residents.

The project, a requirement for the basic design course of the third-year landscape architecture program, began with a two-week base data gathering phase, followed by a four-week team design phase. Students travelled to the Cook's Bay area town by bus during the length of the project to design strategy and various alternatives to proposals.

The U of T students worked independently of a company hired by the town, Project Planning and Associates, which was hired to do "a lot of things we've already done," according to student Greg Chin.

The students presented their results to the faculty and other students in the department in December. They will offer their recommendations to the town council and residents of Keswick next week.

"We accomplished a community plan for the town," said landscape architecture student Eric Eglite. "It's up to the town to decide what to do with it. Our class got a lot out of it (the project) because we dealt with the bureaucracy of town planning."

Stuffet, Muffett

By TED STAUNTON

You've probably noticed that this paper has been running stories about some of the fascinating but unsung people who populate the campus. There have been stories on boxers, pros who used to hang out with Abbie Hoffman, and a host of others. Not to be outdone, Hello In There decided to track down its own campus personality.

Thus it is with great pride that we present an interview with the U of T student who has been registered as an undergraduate for the greatest consecutive number of years and is still attending the university. Miss Felice Muffett.

Varsity: Good morning Miss Muffett. How are you today?

Muffett: What's it to you?

Varsity: Nothing, nothing, Miss Muffett, you are the undisputed record holder for most consecutive years as an undergraduate. First of all then, Miss Muffett how old are you?

Muffett: I'll be 28 next January.

Varsity: Miss Muffett, I don't mean to challenge you, but our records show you have been enrolled as an undergraduate since 1919. Assuming you were about 18 at the time.

Muffett: Now hold on right there, buster! Are you calling me a liar?

Varsity: No, I -

Muffett: You're treading on thin ice there! You'll be up to your neck in a libel suit if you're not careful. I wasn't in law in '31 and '32 for the fun of it you know.

Varsity: Suppose we start again. Exactly how many years have you been an undergraduate here at the university?

Muffett: I've been a registered student here for the past 58 years. Varsity: That beats the old record by how much?

Muffett: 12 years. Cosmo Goberman held the old record. He was here from 1902 to 1948, 46 years before he graduated.

Varsity: That's an impressive record as well. You must feel proud to have broken it.

Muffett: Yes, well I do, you know? But I guess in the end Cosmo didn't have the staying power you need to be one of the greats.

Varsity: Miss Muffett, what kinds of courses have you been taking to keep you busy for the last 58 years? Muffett: You mean what haven't I taken! I've tried them all. Actuarial Science to Zoology.

Varsity: Which field have you found the most interesting?

Muffett: I thought they were all crap.

Varsity: Now let me just get this straight. You've been here for the past 58 years and you haven't found one course you've liked?

Muffett: That's right.

Varsity: Then why do you keep returning?

Muffett: Well, for the first 15 years or so I just figured it was better than working or getting married, and then the social life was just terrific for oh, at least the first 30 years. Of course by then I was getting interested in the record. Cosmo was working his way through all the "S" courses and I was just finished with the "M's" so I figured I could outlast him. Apart from the record, I was pretty involved in the protest movements. Now I find that the student grants from the government are just too good to pass up.

CUP cuts itself back

By ERIC McMILLAN

Economic difficulties and internal disagreement are leading Canada's student press organization into next year with a reduced structure and no president yet.

Only one candidate, Gene Long, ran for the position of president at the 40th national conference of Canadian University Press (CUP) in Halifax over the Christmas holidays. Long was defeated, receiving only 16 votes out of 46 cast.

Long was considered the choice of the outgoing CUP national executive. The current executive holds office until the end of this publishing year, by which time next year's president will have to be chosen by a hiring committee.

CUP has recently come through a period of "expansion" which has seen Varsity membership fees more than quadruple to $7,500 in two years. The failure of "expansion" has in fact led to consensus that services and budgets have to be cut back.

The Ontario region of CUP, including the Varsity, has carried out a fees strike this year pending the outcome of the conference.

The conference decided not to cut this year's budget but to roll it back 20 per cent next year, mainly at the insistence of Ontario papers.

Plans for more power to the regions and lower fees came from Ontario caucuses and were hotly debated in plenary sessions and commissions meetings. In the end the national executive scaled down its plan to reduce fees while maintaining a centralized news service.

The question of what to do about this year's looming deficit is still undecided. With over $70 thousand in fees still outstanding, it is not yet known whether hired staff will have to be laid off.

The conference also saw a vicious debate over the national executive's proposed recognition of a student press organization in Quebec. The organization known as Presse Etudiant Nationale (PEN) was dubbed "scab-PEN" by detractors because it seeks to replace the original PEN which still functions.

The original PEN's leadership was fired a year ago by the Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ), the Quebec student council organization, when the views of the two organizations diverged. ANEQ proceeded to help the second PEN establish itself as a student press organization.

ANEQ was itself refused recognition by the U of T student council (SAC) in December.

The CUP executive's proposal for recognition was passed, reconsidered and passed again.

In other business, member papers decided not to run any more ads for the RCMP or armed forces.

The motion not to carry armed forces recruitment ads followed upon a declaration by Prime Minister Trudeau that he would use the army in Quebec if necessary. A fact sheet was circulated showing the Trudeau government plans to increase military spending 12 per cent a year above inflation until 1981 and to enlarge the armed forces by 5,000 by next year.

The motion to refuse RCMP recruitment advertising noted, "The RCMP has been used, since its inception, to persecute Canada's native people, workers, immigrants, and people who hold progressive political views."

Speakers pointed out that ads carried in member papers show Mounties water-skiing and helping little children rather than burning barns, tapping phones, and strike-breaking.

The motion also pointed out, "The Canadian government is moving towards increasing the powers of the RCMP."

The Varsity delegation became notorious for pressing unsuccessfully for full discussion of the CUP news service and the role of CUP before passing motions to continue for another year.

Islamic Studies gets a new course

By CAROLINE CONNELL

"Sociology of the Arab Middle East," a new half course offered by the Department of Middle Eastern and Islamic Studies, begins this term under the tutelage of Professor Elia Zureik.

The course has been under preparation for approximately a year, and reflects "a trend within the department towards more emphasis on the social sciences," according to Department Chairman Lorne Kenny. He expressed hope that the course may become a permanent offering.

The course will centre around an analysis of marked changes in the economic, social, and political institutions of the Arab world, brought about during the twentieth century. The "precise nature of this process of transition from traditionalism to modernism" will be examined from a sociological point of view comprising several different approaches.

Kenny said he expected about five or six students for the first meeting on Monday but said "there may be quite a lot more."

"Yale considered me a token representative of the emerging nation."
John Evans

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

LOADED DICE

The recommendations contained in the eagerly-awaited McDonald report, the five-year External Review of the Governing Council, hold a number of disappointing surprises for students.

Even a cursory reading, without the scrutiny between the lines that such reports require, reveals that the hard-won advances made by students during the parity struggles of the late sixties and early seventies have been thrown out of the window in favor of a structure that definitely loads the dice against student representation.

Consider it. A "Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning" that comprises 61 — count 'em — 61 members. And of this number, seven lone students emerge, their voices crying in the wilderness of teaching staff (26), administrative staff (7), principals, deans or directors (7), alumni (7) and "Lieutenant Governor in Council" appointees (7).

Token representation lives again — in the heart of Simcoe Hall. It is hard to imagine students having an effective voice, in this new-fangled "Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning", while they are outnumbered by the appointed and elected heavyweights from various well-appointed offices in and around the U of T campus.

Nascent fears of a new Governing Council that has all the disregard for students that the old Board of Governors had are given a healthy birth with the recommendation that puts the matter in black and white: standing committees of the council may now have an estate majority.

Logic and the principle of democratic government play a very minor role in these recommendations. Mr. McDonald states in his report that the number of students on the standing committees is an unimportant matter. This same should be true of the faculty estate. Why then does he propose a structure — the most powerful standing committee on the council — with a built-in majority representation of teaching staff? His recommendation to rescind the no-estate-majority requirement almost comes as an afterthought.

Mr. McDonald's recommendations, if adopted and implemented, will leave the Governing Council a toothless and muzzled watchdog on university and administrative affairs. His concessions are insignificant; they are just that after the major shift in power — from the legislative bodies at the standing and subcommittee level to the Office of the President.

A Governing Council that serves primarily to "approve, reject or refer back" the matters that directly affect the thousands of students supporting this university is, it seems to us, an unacceptable proposal. A council that stacks its committee membership against the very foundation of the university is a proposal totally preposterous.

Gather up your briefs, reports, hearing transcripts and reviews, Mr. McDonald; read them over again; and come back with recommendations that are fair to all the estates.

Stuart Smith

In an article on Monday, October 17th, in The Varsity, it was reported that "the Liberal Party gave its total support to the concept of free post-secondary education for all people." I do not wish the University community to be misled and I want to make clear that our policy is not to abolish tuition fees but rather to assure "free access to post-secondary education." That is, we believe that there should be no financial barrier preventing capable and willing students from obtaining an equal chance to occupy what places are available in our post-secondary institutions. I feel certain that students present at my University of Toronto talk of October 13th would agree that I at no time promised "free post-secondary education for all people."

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Best wishes.

No big words

I have a desiderium to understand the current literary situation on the university campus, for which I rely upon the Varsity. To aid this would you please stop printing large (?) and difficult to understand words. This would discourage their indiscriminant use, and aid comprehension by the bourgeois.

I refer to the letter of Nov. 30 "No Multisyllabity" by Ben Pon in which Ben Pon uses (the word) "concerned." A survey revealed that one person knew this word. Most thought it had something to do with multi-national corporations.

If you insist upon printing such words would you include an explanation. This would increase our comprehension and would be a step on behalf of illiteracy which is now desiderated in our education. Thank you.

Rosenbergs

I'm sorry to see a U of T student, Martin Heavides, presumably a Canadian (?) so gleeful about the latest attempt to cover Julius and Ethel Rosenberg in the dung of U.S. politics. Heavides has no worry about libel with the publication The Public Burning, but he's thinking of libel from the Nixon source. I'm thinking of the Rosenberg side, and if I had the money I'd initiate it myself.

I haven't read the Coover "satirical novel" (and don't hope to), but obviously Heavides hasn't read the Rosenbergs' Death House Letters. At least three of the ideas Heavides finds so amusing had their origins in the Rosenberg letters: the elephant allusion, the pants-dropping, and the third I cannot mention in brief. In trying to keep up each others' spirits, Ethel mentioned her garb on first arrival at the "C.C." (Condemned Cells), including the loose undergarment, all in funny description. And then Julius, at long last being allowed outside on the roof for exercise, told his wife of the fun of the ball game with other prisoners, but, not being allowed belt or shoelaces, the hectic attempts to keep dressed.

On the third reference I find so painful, that anyone could so sickeningly put the name of Nixon in the same sentence with these honored dead. Not even original here, Coover has taken the desperate letter of the shocked Ethel, when someone had hinted to her she might escape death if she reneged on Julius:

"So now my life is to be bargained off against my husband's! ... How diabolical! A cold fury possesses me and I could retch with horror and revulsion, for these saviours are actually proposing to erect a sepulchre in which I shall live without living, and die without dying. By day there will be no hope, and by night there will be no peace.

Over and over again I shall see the beloved face and fancy I hear the beloved voice. Over and over again, I shall sob out the last heart broken, wracking goodbyes, and reel under the impact of irrevocable murder!

"And what of our children? What manner of mercy is it that would slay their adored father and deliver up their devoted mother to everlasting emptiness? I should far rather embrace my husband in death than live on ingloriously upon such bounty ..."

Nor has Heavides read their sons (Robert and Michael) We Are Your Sons. While they have selected different letters in some cases for their book, they had this letter of their mother's printed more fully. It continues ...

"Be under no illusions, either, magnanimous sirs, that I shall besmirch and dishonor my marital vows and the felicity and integrity of the relationship we shared, to play the role of harlot to political procurers. My husband is innocent as I am myself and no power on earth shall divide us in life or in death ... My shattered life shall be his immortality and his memory shall be safe from your wicked debauchery. But the savage reprisal you visited upon me shall pursue you to the edge of your graves and beyond, and your names shall be anathema wherever love is the First Commandment! Take heed, reckless speculators in human misery, lest History exhume your rotten carrion and solemnly charge you with cold-blooded killing! Take heed, despoilers of all that is good, lest you create a new and more flaming 'Joan'!" (There had been an earlier letter recalling words from George Bernard Shaw's play, and its reference to the "man-of-God" who turned against Joan of

So what is so "great" about Coover and his so-called "psychological reality"? He is disgusting in even considering a "joke" that the Rosenbergs are supposed to be saying, "I refuse to testify on the grounds that it may tend to incinerate me". Even though Heavides has the excuse that he is too young to remember the vigil we had (2000-strong and more) on University Avenue, in front of the U.S. consulate, I don't think Coover is that young. How can he dare to write such garbage, inflicting even more pain on Michael and Robert, who are his generation, and still trying to win recognition of their parents' innocence, together with an American Committee for this purpose. Coover must surely have been aware of the hundreds of thousands of protesters, of the appeals from such persons as the Pope and Einstein. He must surely know of the tortures inflicted on the Rosenberg boys, and their present great contribution in economics and anthropology. What is Coover's reason for torturing another piece of torture? Money? Taking advantage of the anti-Nixon sentiment, he's not courageous enough to name Eisenhower (the President who wanted the execution for publicity) in the throng at "showdown". Nor is he willing to give "equal time" to that other throng, not in Times Square, in Union Square, where the real American patriots stayed, while we in Toronto did likewise here, to demonstrate what the Rosenbergs knew: this was an attack on all civil liberties, and inseparably tied in with the war profiteers' drive to extend the Korean war into a world conflagration.

No, Heavides, I'm not bitter towards you, just sad to think a Canadian student could fall for this stuff, or, if you really think it's essential to write like Coover to reach North Americans, then it's sad to think that. I believe there are many of us in both our countries who have the guts and the intelligence to read the real thing and understand it.

I can't think here

This morning (Dec. 3) I took the Law School Aptitude Test (LSAT) at the Medical Sciences Building in conditions grossly inadequate for such testing.

The room (Med Sci 31540 has the standard lecture-hall armrests instead of tables or desks, and it is impossible to spread a test booklet out properly on these armrests. While they may serve the purpose for lecture note-taking, the University should see fit to provide decent table space (such as that available for exams at the Drill Hall) for aptitude-testing exams, at which the student must have both an open test booklet and an answer sheet in front of him, should have at least minimally comfortable seating, and should not have to crane his neck down at an angle for four hours.

One cannot but be pleased that John Grant (Reply to dissent, Nov. 25) has discovered the paradisiac life offered in the Soviet Union, where constitutional amendments are openly debated by the "entire nation". Thus I propose that a joint Canadian-Soviet exchange program be started to assure this student's happiness. Canada would provide the one-way ticket to Moscow and the Soviet Union would extend the privilege of free tuition. Any other "privileges" which the Soviets may wish to provide we leave to the reader's imagination.

Hoover's home movies tell it all, but forget how to say it properly

The Private Files of J. Edgar Hoover is an interesting film, but there are too many scenes where the script suggests that the director screenwriter Larry Cohen was thinking, "let's get all the information into this scene which is crucial for our thesis, and incidentally let's see if we can give it some drama". I think it would have been better for the movie if along with his laudable desire to inform the public at a rapid rate about the long and many-twisted career of J. Edgar Hoover, Cohen had also been animated by the desire to make everything that went before the camera really work dramatically and cinematically.

For instance there is a scene in which he wants to show us why the FBI began to carry guns. We see an agent come up to a back door in an alley and halt a man coming out, saying, "Sir, we'd like to ask you a few questions, could you come with me please?" The man looks at his badge, says, "You guys don't carry guns, do you?" and pulls out a gun and plugs him. It's not easy for an actor to speak as contrived a line as that with conviction. There are other scenes where actors speak paragraphs of journalistic prose to each other rather than dialogue.

All this being considered, the actors give memorable performances, especially (amongst the lesser performers) the actors playing Bobby Kennedy and F. Delano Roosevelt. Roosevelt in particular; the eerily cynical quality of his performance in his two brief appearances in gripping, particularly in one of the scenes in the film which really works, both cinematically and dramatically: a marvelous confrontation in which J. Edgar Hoover, rightist bigot, confronts liberal Justice Earl Warren and New Deal President F. Delano Roosevelt in outrage at their imprisoning of the Japanese civilians in California after the bombing of Pearl Harbor.

"I'm surprised to hear you object to it, Edgar," says Warren.

"The only thing I object to is stupidity," says Hoover. "The Japs bombed Pearl Harbor; you didn't arrest the Japanese in Hawaii, but you arrested them in California two thousand miles away. Why?"

Roosevelt sits back in his chair and diddles with his fingers and says, "I expect to be criticized for this. Great men are often criticized. Lincoln was criticized, and I expect I will be too. Nevertheless, we're going ahead with it, Edgar."

This is a scene that really works as film, not just as highly intelligent political journalism put on celluloid. There is a similarly great moment showing Bobby Kennedy giving a speech after the death of Martin Luther King, with a great white light behind his head. In moments such as these, and in much of Crawford's performance as Hoover, as well as in moments with Rip Torn as Clifton Webb, the film thoroughly engages the viewer, on a much higher level than a careful and sophisticated, but dry, political tract.

Crawford's performance as Hoover will remind some of his great performance two decades ago as Willy Stark in All the King's Men, but the contrasts are more startling than the similarities; both Hoover and Stark are demagogues, anti-democratic and dangerous to the freedom of their societies, but their styles are very different. Stark is a hard-drinking womanizer; Hoover may have been a virgin when he died, living with his mother until she passed on. Hoover is a much more monolithic figure. A story Mr. Crawford told me about a personal meeting with Hoover might illustrate this a little. Crawford was introduced to him by a reporter friend during a party New Year's Eve, 1938-39. He was introduced by a reporter friend, and three years later he met Hoover again, and said, "I'm certain, Mr. Hoover, that you won't remember me." Hoover not only remembered him, but the reporter who introduced them and the hostess at the party. Impressive.

It suggests the quality of Hoover's mind, which in its operation was not unlike a giant clam with hinges of stainless steel — huge enough to contain whole computer-banks of information, snapping in all directions, opening only long enough to take in new information, and nothing which had once been taken in ever got out again.

The greatest strength of the film is the degree to which it reveals that quality about Hoover; he had to have new facts, new data, new statistics, new dirt flowing in constantly, yet he guarded with fierce steely reinforcements against anything getting out. That was no doubt why in all the years of his extraordinary career his mind was never invaded by a new concept. To really take in a new idea you have to open yourself a lot more, and for a lot longer, than a snapping clam continually on guard.

An early scene illustrates this defensiveness. He comes up to a lady's apartment after a date. She begins to make moves on him, and he just freezes, unable to respond. Finally she begins to disrobe, and he grabs her wrist — "Who put you up to this? Where are they hidden? You've got somebody hidden here, don't you?" And he starts rambling frantically through all the rooms. Years later, and this is one of the great scenes in the movie, he is talking to a waiter in the restaurant where he always eats lunch, never pays. He is lonely, and wants to talk, but he has no habits for talking straight to anybody, so what he starts doing is revealing everything he has on the waiter — as a way of friending up. "That sorority your daughter's thinking of joining — warn her that it's a communist front. The girl your son was dating? Tramp, I checked her out." And then he tells how "A woman tried to trap me once — but I got out of that." And then he tells the waiter that she died last week — he's kept a file on her all these years. And then he starts quoting "If" at the waiter who is terribly embarrassed at all this attention.

The waiter in fact is more than embarrassed as we see a moment later; he is almost unbinged; he is standing outside the restaurant in California sun weeping uncontrollably at this assault from the great man — this sudden barrage of Hoover's version of warmth and openness.

The Private Files of J. Edgar Hoover is always rich journalistically, informationally, it gives a coherent and careful ordering to much of the material connected with Hoover's life and times — but in a half dozen moments such as this scene we have just described with the waiter, and in Mr. Crawford's performance as Hoover as a whole, it is much more than that, and gives a rich dramatic quality to its revelations and events as well. The film might be worth seeing for its thesis and its careful marshalling of facts alone; but it is most memorable in those moments where, without sacrificing anything in accuracy or care in reportage, it is able to rise to the level of real cinema and real drama as well.

Martin Heavisesides

Is there intelligent life out there and if so, why are they in this film?

What would happen if a flying saucer the size of a football field were to gently touch down in the middle of Times Square and half a dozen aliens that look like a cross between a fire hydrant and Ernest Borgnine were to get out and start distributing pamphlets to passers-by? Nothing. People in New York don't notice trivia like that.

In Steven Spielberg's sci-fi epic Close Encounters of the Third Kind, however, everyone approaches contact with alien beings as an everyday, even mundane event. Sure, there's some initial wonder and awe, but once that is over and done with, everyone in Spielberg's world is ready to take the little green beggars home to the kids. It is in this assumption about the sophistication of people in such fantastic situations that Close Encounters fails. It is not the humane, intelligent science fiction film that we so desperately need in the wake of Star Wars, but rather a dew-eyed look at a gravely important possibility that staunchly ignores the all too human elements of unreasoning fear, irrational loathing and mental dis-orientation. Spielberg should be working for Disney.

This oversight is particularly apparent in the final scenes of the movie. Up until that point the film moves along at a reasonable clip with Richard Dreyfuss re-running his stock idiocyncracies and Francois Truffaut mumbling in deadpan French. They portray their inherently flat characters convincingly enough, but in the end they are upstaged by the wide-eyed four year old, Cary Guffy. He's the only one in the movie who looks like he has seen a flying saucer.

As the plot thickens, and Dreyfuss and Truffaut move closer and closer towards their encounter, we become acutely aware of one thing. Spielberg has lost, or has chosen to ignore, the plays on tension that he handled so deftly in Jaws. That toothsome flick may have been mindless, but it kept you on the edge of your seat with its almost flawless balance of intentional nyuks and oh-jesus-it-bit-off-his-leg scare tactics. The only scenes in Encounters where Spielberg manages the same effect are Dreyfuss first encounter in his parked truck (a pair of headlights pull up behind him and then rise straight into the air) and the scene in which little Guffy is kidnapped. The rest of the confrontation scenes pack the punch of unsullied Silverwood eggnog.

Up to this point, with a little editing, the movie would be salvageable. But Spielberg blows the whole shebang in the final scene atop Devil's Tower, Wyoming. First, the observers who gather for this momentous confrontation are so bored with the whole affair that a sports announcer, freshly recruited from the Wide World of Golf, can come over the P.A. with comments like, "Well, ladies and gentlemen, we couldn't ask for a nicer night for it, now could we?" Secondly, Spielberg draws out the whole affair with a series of anti-climactic encounters to the point that you wish someone would grab a twenty-two and start taking potshots at the whizzing gizmos. Then he makes the unforgivable mistake of showing us the aliens. The one close-up we get is passable, but the long-shots depict the extraterrestrials as your standard little green men with big heads. The only thing that's missing is the T.V. bunny-ear antenna coming out of their foreheads. Finally he has the alien mothercraft (which looks like a cross between a wok and the skyline of Manhattan), with Dreyfuss snugly aboard, float off into the closing credits. Cute.

The movie does have some good ideas and scenes. The aliens communicate with the earth-types via musical tones. This makes for a fascinating take-off on duelling banjos. The invention of a computer controlled camera allows for pans during what would otherwise be fixed matter or super-imposed shots. But in the end, technical wizardry is no match for Spielberg's syrupy-sweet vision. It's mildly diverting, but it's no Jaws.

Incurable movie-goers and devout followers of this paper's WATSUP columns will have noticed a curious phenomenon. Although there have been film nights at the OISE auditorium two nights a week well nigh since the flood of '93, these events have rarely if ever been listed. There are two reasons for this seemingly reprehensible neglect, the first is mediocre to nonexistent promotion, the second is that the films shown have not been worth listing.

Given the OISE auditorium's proximity to the main campus, this has been more than slightly unfortunate. Those of us whose interests do not centre themselves on last year's Hollywood glossies have had to trek out to the commercial repertory houses instead, or, given those theatres' increasing reluctance to take chances, out to that ultima Thule which masquerades as the Ontario Science Centre.

Thanks to some enterprising soul in the Graduate Students Association and to a brave lady named Elaine Hurwitz this situation is about to be remedied.

Ms. Hurwitz is an independent film-maker, and is a face familiar to us old fans who remember the days when tents in the Revue's lobby would have made life more sensible. But she has never been involved in programming at movie house before. These credentials, laudable as one might consider them are not those usually sought by film societies who are losing money. The OISE screenings have been emptying their pockets for the last couple of years, in spite of a policy of screening more and more middle-of-the-road pictures. When it became obvious that some change was necessary, the Graduate Students Association decided that they had little to lose by taking a chance with more adventurous programming and they hired someone who was willing to take the risks for them.

There was a time when a pronouncement of that order would have conjured images of a succession of films of which no one had ever heard, and which no one had any wish to see. At this point, however, any cinema which doesn't show Mel Brooks movies twice a week is on the brink of the revolution. Hurwitz has, however, no wish to do missionary work, and is without the hard-line aesthetic one often encounters in those who take film as art seriously.

The advertising blurb labels the new program as 'diverse and fanciful'. I'm not at all sure what is meant by the latter term, but the former is certainly valid. In the first two months OISE will be showing films from Japan, Brazil, Senegal, and Canada, as well as those countries whose cinema is somewhat more familiar. Films by Buster Keaton and Douglas Sirk will cheek-to-cheek with those by Malle, Fassbinder, Ozu, and Ousmane Sembene.

Hurwitz maintains that her personal leanings toward the 'avant-garde' and the 'independent' will remain secondary to her desire to make available films which are not normally seen. She will make no attempt to popularize, the films will be there if anyone wishes to see them. This attitude has caused more than a little sage head-shaking in the film community. The common wisdom is that she and OISE will lose their shirts. Many of the repertory houses are in that process, but whether their crowds have diminished because of creeping conservatism on the part of the audience or because everyone in town has seen the hundred or so films which keep reappearing, is an arguable question. How many times can one person watch Theorem

Distributors, she admits, are a problem. Prints of many important films are simply unavailable in this country. And few distribution companies are willing to make investments which aren't tattooed blue-chip. But, she points out, New York City manages to support five 'art houses' — Toronto ought to manage one. Once a clientele is established for a program of seldom-seen films, those who purchase prints will become braver. A quick leaf through any distributors catalogue will reveal dozens of films which have never made the screen in this city. If Hurwitz succeeds, and there are once again line-ups at OISE's door on Wednesday and Thursday, we might see others take similar chances.

There is, however, the prevailing aesthetic to hack through. Interest in film has declined. The folks out there still go to the Uptown on their weekend dates, but the three or four a week types are an endangered species. They've moved over into other fields leaving the movie-houses emptier than they used to be.

There is another audience, though, if they could ever be convinced. Hurwitz told me that she once showed one of her films, a long piece without the trappings of plot and immediately recognisable unity which are assumed to be necessary for any sort of mass appeal, to a group of middle-aged engineers. They sat enthralled, discussed it afterward, and demanded a repeat showing the next day. They hadn't understood, or at least not as the film-maker had but she could hear the barriers crashing on all sides. The audience is there if only they might be convinced of their identity. It is to this, quixotic as it may appear to the wise money, that the OISE series dedicates itself.

"Aye, this is always the way in the theatre," erupts Mr. Puff a character from Richard Brinsley Sheridan's last comedy written in 1799. 'The Critic'. "Give these fellows (actors) a good thing and they will never know when to have done with it." Puff's statement stands the test of time only too well. Next week (January 9-15, Mon-Sat: 8:30 p.m., Sun: 2:30 p.m., Admission Free) the Drama Centre is to present a production of this work at the Glen Morris Street Studio Theatre.

The play concerns the hilarious misadventures of Mr. Puff (the overzealous critic in question who prefers to be known as a "professor of the art of puffing"), and his friends in the world of the 'legitimate' theatre. Eagerly, the visitors watch the final rehearsal of Puff's new tragedy from the wings of Drury Lane Theatre. 'The Critic' is an effective parody of both theatrical styles and effects. Indeed, one academic, Louis Kronenberger, in his introduction to the collected works of Sheridan went so far as to state: "The Critic is very probably the best, which means also the most payable, stage burlesque in the English language."

However, this play is rarely staged because of expense. It has a large cast and complicated stage effects. Given only a $500 budget the director of the Glen Morris Street Studio production had to find a way around extravagant expenditures. Herbert Whittaker, the director and himself a long time critic for the Globe and Mail, has done this by "pushing the spectacle away from the play-within-the-play and concentrating on the commentary made by Mr. Puff and his friends in the wings." Because Whittaker had to take into consideration not only the characters of the actors in the rehearsed, tragedy but also the playwright and onstage stagehands who sit on either side of the main action, the effect is that of a three-ring circus. For every turn in the tragedy there are two different reactions.

The constant shifting within the production between stage and sideline and the frequent counterpointing of side remarks with the text proper is of great value to the overall outcome. While the play-within-the-play has its fair share of good things like a superbly irrelevant subplot and a nonsensical procession of the Thames and his impersonated tributaries, the fun is greatly enhanced by the sideline characters.

If The Critic takes potshots at something eternal in some kinds of playwriting, it also takes them at what is eternal in every kind of production. In spoofing outmoded language and ludicrous attitudes, capricious workmanship and desperate stage business, Sheridan has contrived something that theatrically stands on its own legs. Let's hope the production at the Glen Morris Street Studio Theatre will at least walk, if not run.

(Every End Exposed, Yael Hoffman Transl. and Ed., Autumn Press, Massachusetts $4.50 paperback.)

Yael Hoffman in his preface to Every End Exposed: The One Hundred Perfect Koans of Master Kido, remarks, "Although composed of words, the koan does not work through the medium of language alone," and in reading his preface it is apparent that here and there Mr. Hoffman, using words, would nevertheless prefer not to work through the medium of language at all. "By the same token, the koan is intended as a spur to our creative intuition, wherein resides our potential for wakening from the misconceptions that ensnare us in a world of logic and intellect, or, in Zen, a world of suffering. But do not expect to find abstract philosophy here... the koan deals with quite ordinary events, often in an irreverent and earthy manner."

Gee, it's nice to deal with ordinary events in an earthy and irreverent manner! I bet once you've all tried dealing with them in an earthy and irreverent manner you'll never want to go back to dealing with them in a heavenly and reverent manner by gee, by gosh! The writing here is reminiscent of the turgid prose of Carlos Castaneda, who frequently mentions how Don Juan would tell a string of jokes or puns "which were altogether funny". Thankfully most of the preface, and all of Mr. Hoffman's commentaries on the koans, is on a higher level than the murkiness of "wherein resides our potential for wakening from the misconceptions that ensnare us" or the "Golly gee whiz, Mr. Science, you're sure terrific!" style of "Often in an earthy and irreverent manner."

But when it comes right down to it, golly gee whiz, Mr. Science, the koans actually are pretty marvelous, a series of pithy sayings and doings of the Masters which transmit, slowly and surely, the wisdom of Zen, especially the habit of mind at the centre of Zen, which refuses to be bound by categories and preconceptions but strives continually to expand the understanding of the world as it actually is. The transmission of Zen wisdom is sometimes oblique and metaphorical ("The coral branches reflect the moon") sometimes as literal as a crack on the skull with a cudgel, to bury some sense inside it.

One of my favourites from the koans is the story of the master who asks his attendant, "What are you doing?" — "Eating my lunch," the attendant replies. "I was asking about your essence," says the teacher. "Well, if you are asking about my essence," says the attendant, "then I am actually eating my lunch." — "No wonder you are my attendant," says the Zen master and strides away.

I'm especially fond of this story because it shows how even a Zen master can act on occasion like a dollop of uncured sheepdip (I mean in the Zen sense). The attendant's reply is faultless, and his second reply very accurately assesses the trap into which the Zen master has fallen — but the master is more interested in being officious than in giving an inferior his due.

As I was reading this book, I thought of several anecdotes I know of various people, which could be thought of as koans in Occidental Zen, three coming to mind which are particularly illuminating. These I offer the eager and panting reader:

Completely Exposed
(a koan of Lenny Bruce)

A man's on a airplane, tacked out, asleep — his fly is open, he is completely exposed. Another man seeing this asks a stewardess for a piece of paper on which to write a note to the man: — "Dear Sir: I am seated next to you, your fly is open, you are completely exposed. I thought I should advise you of this in as tactful a manner as possible. Yours Sincerely, Frank Martin. P.S. I love you."

As a new comedy flic about a strange success story, The World's Greatest Lover, cannot itself be considered the world's greatest success. The plot (when not absurdly improbable) is predictable, and sticks to the framework of the worn out Hollywood "A Star is Born" theme. Ruby Hickman, played by Gene Wilder, is a nobody from Milwaukee who gets fired from his dreary job for his ineptitude on the cake conveyor belt.

Meanwhile after a good cry over his latest fiasco, producer Zitz of Rainbow Studios advertises country-wide for a leading man in his prospective film "The World's Greatest Lover", about Rudolph Valentino. Rudy H. decides to audition, speeds with girlfriend Annie (Carole Kane) to Hollywood and makes "Valentine" his new surname (some rather uninspired humour results from the similarity in nomenclature that you've no doubt noticed). Annie leaves the bathroom running and sneaks away from the hotel, ditching Rudy for Rudolph. She never meets him. The world raves about the newest star when Rudy gets the coveted part after treating the crew to two ambiguous and unorthodox auditions, scrapping the script intended for him.

The end is a twist — it twists the plot into racetrack form, ending where it starts. Rudy leaves the set and crew, on his horse in the middle of a scene in order to catch up with Annie, who's on a Milwaukee-bound choo-choo. He shouts at the director "This is fake! This is not real!"

The turnaround is inexplicable. The action may as well have not occurred at all, and if the point is in the message — to expose and reject the worthlessness and phoniness of the Hollywood world with its talking mannequins — it fails. Although the acting is good (if overblown) the characters are not real, and there are few human moments. The movie, then, espouses the fakery from which it seems to try to escape. I may be finicky, but I expect comedy too, to convey its message (if it has one) and still to remain consistent in so doing.

Certain moments will make you explode. On the train, Rudy sits next to Annie, who is sleeping with her head covered in a white blanket. Opposite Annie a man is dozing, also in a white blanket. With a violent jolt the seating arrangement gets switched, and Rudy winds up seated next to the man, whose head is concealed. Rudy starts caressing his neighbour. The shocked expression on the faces of the two men when they see each other is enough to make you wet your pants in hysterics. Then, when Rudy reaches over to Annie, waking her up, she screams "I said NO you filthy pig!"

When Annie leaves the water running and flies out the window, she floods the luxurious hotel suite. Eccentric gusts arrive and start swimming. Below, in the dining room, a lady says "Waiter, could you bring some water?" Just then water splashes down from the ceiling. Funny.

All in all, a funny but flawed film. See it anyways — you won't yawn.

Who Was the Little Boy?

Master Allport went to visit Master Freud in his study one day, having received a generous reply to a letter in which Master Allport mentioned that he was a brilliant psychiatric thinker and Master Freud would of course be pleased to make his acquaintance. Master Freud welcomed him and indicated a chair. Master Allport felt uncertain, and immediately began telling Master Freud about a boy he had seen on the train whose mother was pulling at him. "The boy was crying and dirty, and the mother was obviously very cross with him." Freud replied, "And was the little boy you?"

Not Enough of This

A woman brought the script of a Western film to Master Paul Schrader to read and appraise. When he had done, she asked him what he thought and he said, "For what you are doing, there is simply not enough of this", and he slipped a .45 from his desk and pointed it straight at her face.

Where the future is now

Fleetwood Mac sweeps poll!!

It's been a rough year. Guy Lombardo, Elvis Presley, der Bingle, Groucho Marx, Charlie Chaplin and Marc Bolan died. And Dan Hill didn't. Who could find joy in such a fatal year? Who could ridicule the living and ignore the dead? Only the annual Varsity music poll can.

Enclose is a compilation of our university's most intelligent and opinionated music critics. We won't say that our opinions are right, but they're a damn sight better than yours. So if you find your fave raves in our wimps column, buck up chum. We're journalists.

BEST ALBUM OF THE YEAR

Never Mind The Bollocks, Here's The Sex Pistols
Sex Pistols

For months we heard horror stories about the havoc these boys were creating in British airports and were duly impressed with their obvious charm. Then low and behold they bring out an album which is musically intriguing, covered with great lyrics and reeking with the energy that every rock band since the beginning of the decade has lacked. They are the best punk band, and perhaps the best hard rock band around. Whatever the namer, this album is consistently brilliant. And on top of that, it's a bone fide monument of the seventies.

RUNNERSUP

David Bowie

David places second only because Eno didn't have a solo album this year. However this disc is covered with Eno, making up for that deficiency and going one step further. It's a collection of highly textured musical mood tone pieces that are indicative of the best of modern avant-garde musical aesthetics.

My Aim Is True

Elvis Costello

The bespectacled, pint-sized Springsteen-Buddy Holly-Woody Allen hybrid has come out of nowhere to bring a wryly amusing album about the pains of going through puberty looking like a stork with a gland problem.

Animals

Pink Floyd

The big pink pulls their standard array of whining synthesizer and drawn-out guitar solos out of the bag in this far out, psychedelic tone poem. Great stuff if you like pigs and social commentary in the same sentence.

BEST SINGLE

God Save The Queen

Sex Pistols

This is, perhaps, the definitive, Pistols tune. It takes a meaningful swipe at the British class structure without losing its impact as a driving rock tune. An amazing little ditty.

And now for the dregs, the sludge of 1977. First of all, the most putrid hunk of plastic ...

Longer Fuse

Dan Hill

A unanimous choice. It is a sad reflection on our so-called sophisticated society when such tripe is put on vinyl. Hill's airy fairy musical arrangements and shallow lyrics leave everything to be desired. Who cares about his parents, sexual failures, and overall impotency? Dan Hill is the Betty Kennedy of popular music and as such should be ignored. Folk music is deservedly an endangered species thanks to the likes of Hill.

Next the runners up, each and everyone a real loser.

Footloose And Fancy Free by Rod Stewart (We're with you Britt).

Hotel California by the Eagles (sickle cell rock).

Disco Christmas, (Boogie till ya puke).

Let's not forget all those teenie weenie singles that cause those multiple pile-ups on the 401 as people fly rocketships to Torontonious or exhibit their decals.

Disco version of the theme from Star Wars by Meca: long, long time ago in a galaxy far away. Puke till you boogie.

Sometimes When You Touch Me by Dan Hill: not with a ten foot pole

You Light Up My Life by Debbie Boone: what are you doing with that crucifix, Debbie?

You're In My Heart by Rod Stewart: touch my ticker and I'll slap a writ on your jollies.

BAND OF THE YEAR

Sex Pistols

Naturellement. An incredible album, the best single of the year and never out of the public eye. They've been denounced all over Europe and it took one hell of a battle to get them into the States. Let's hope they make it to Toronto.

BEST CANADIAN BAND

Max Webster.

Finally Canada has produced a reasonable rock band that doesn't write songs about trucks, beer, trains or baby seals. They're no Kiss but they're a refreshing change from the mindless pounding of heavy metal mongoloids like Rush. These guys can actually pronounce words with more than two syllables and are not afraid to be silly.

WORST BAND OF THE YEAR

Fleetwood Mac

This was a hands down winner. Mac is a collection of boring, pretentious musicians who should be working in a coffee house on Spadina run by a questionable religious organisation that thinks that anyone with short hair is a fascist. Their music is safe, clean, and stupid. They are the MacDonalds of rock.

Julius Schmid would like to give you some straight talk about condoms, rubbers, sheaths, safes, French letters, storkstoppers.

All of the above are other names for prophylactics. One of the oldest and most effective means of birth control known and the most popular form used by males. Apart from birth control, use of the prophylactic is the only method officially recognized and accepted as an aid in the prevention of transmission of venereal disease.

Skin Prophylactics.

Skin prophylactics made from the membranes of lambs were introduced in England as early as the eighteenth century. Colloquially known as "armour", used by Cassanova, and mentioned in classic literature by Richard Boswell in his "London Journal" (where we read of his misfortune from not using one), they continue to be used and increase in popularity to this very day.

Because they are made from natural membranes, "skins" are just about the best conductors of body warmth money can buy and therefore their effect on sensation and feeling is almost insignificant.

Rubber Prophylactics

colours, either plain-ended, or tipped with a "teat" or "reservoir end" to receive and hold ejaculated semen.

Lubrication

And thanks to modern chemistry, several new non-reactive lubricants have been developed so that prophylactics are available in either non-lubricated or lubricated forms. The lubricated form is generally regarded as providing improved sensitivity, as is, incidentally, the NuForm® Sensi-Shape. For your added convenience, all prophylactics are pre-rolled and ready-to-use.

Some Helpful Hints

The effectiveness of a prophylactic, whether for birth control or to help prevent venereal disease, is dependent in large measure upon the way in which it is used and disposed of. Here are a few simple suggestions that you may find helpful.

Packaging

First of all, there's the matter of packaging. Skin prophylactics are now packaged premoistened in sealed aluminum foil pouches to keep them fresh, dependable and ready for use. Latex rubber prophylactics are usually packaged in sealed plasticized paper pouches or aluminum foil.

All of these prophylactics, at least those marketed by reputable firms, are tested electronically and by other methods to make sure they are free of defects. Prophylactics are handled very carefully during the packaging operation to make sure they are not damaged in any way.

Prophylactic Shapes

Storage and Handling

It is equally important that you store and handle them carefully after you buy them, if you expect best results and dependability. For example, don't carry them around in your wallet in your back pocket and sit on them from time to time. This can damage them and make them worthless. Next is the matter of opening the package. It's best to tear the paper or foil along one edge so that the simple act of tearing doesn't cause a pinhole. And of course, one should be particularly careful of sharp fingernails whenever handling the prophylactic.

Putting Them On

The condom, or prophylactic, should be put on before there is any contact between the penis and the vaginal area. This is important, as it is possible for small amounts of semen to escape from the penis even before orgasm.

Unroll the prophylactic gently onto the erect penis, leaving about a half of an inch projecting beyond the tip of the penis to receive the male fluid (semen). This is more easily judged with those prophylactics that have a reservoir end. The space left at the end or the reservoir, should be squeezed while unrolling, so that air is not trapped in the closed end.

As mentioned earlier, you may wish to apply a suitable lubricant either to the vaginal entrance or to the outside surface of the prophylactic, or both, to make entry easier and to lessen any risk of the prophylactic tearing.

Taking Them Off

When sexual relations are completed, withdraw the penis while the erection is still present, holding the rim of the prophylactic until withdrawal is complete, so as to stop any escape of semen from the prophylactic as well as to stop it from slipping off. Remove the prophylactic and, as an added precaution, use soap and water to wash the hands, penis and surrounding area and also the vaginal area to help destroy any traces of sperm or germs.

And now for a commercial.

As you've read this far you're probably asking yourself who makes the most popular brands of prophylactics in Canada?

The answer to that is Julius Schmid. And we'd like to take this opportunity to introduce you to six of the best brands of prophylactics that money can buy. They're all made by Julius Schmid. They're all electronically tested to assure dependability and quality. And you can only buy them in drug stores.

RAMSES Regular (Non-Lubricated)

FOUREX "Non-Slip" Skins—distinctly different from rubber, these natural membranes from the lamb are specially processed to retain their fine natural texture, softness and durability. Lubricated and rolled for added convenience.

SHEIK Sensi-Shape (Lubricated)

NuForm Sensi-Shape (Lubricated) & Sensi-Shape (Non-Lubricated). The "better for both" new, scientifically developed shape that provides greater sensitivity and more feeling for both partners. Comes in "passionate pink." Rolled, ready-to-use.

EXCITA Gently ribbed and sensi-shaped to provide "extra pleasure for both partners." Sensitol Lubricated for added sensitivity. Also in "passionate pink." Rolled, ready-to-use.

Fiesta Reservoir end prophylactics in an assortment of colours. Sensitol lubricated for added sensitivity. Rolled, ready-to-use.

We wrote the book on prophylactics. If you would like to read it and get some free samples of what we've been talking about, fill in the coupon below and we'll send you everything in "a genuine plain brown envelope."

Fruits of the loom

I was always a normal kid at school; I mean I was your average stumpy English tyke whose nose never stopped running and who wore Bermuda grey flannel shorts. Then the family moved to the land of the beaver and although no one realised it, I was still your average stumpy English tyke. Where is this leading, I hear all you anti-stumpies cry out? Well, my life was radically changed one night at the Chimney, when Carole Pope, the kinky chanteuse of Rough Trade, left the stage during "Ricardo My Pimp" and straddled my lap while burying her cleavage in my face. I rushed home and burned my comics.

Years passed and I became slightly obsessed with the woman who autographed my album by writing "I want your child." Things really did go better with Rough Trade. Despite numerous personnel changes, Toronto's best mondo-bondo band still hit the spot. I was in love.

December 21, 1977 was the date that would establish Rough Trade as a bone-fide biggie in the rock world. The Massey Hall show would prove that their appeal was not merely limited to dykes, fags, and stumpy Englishmen. The title was Restless Underwear and the special guest star would be Divine, famed underground movie star, and it would be a revue. Kevan Staples, lead guitar and bitchy primadonna of the band, promised it would fulfill all his erotic desires.

Tension mounted as the show started thirty minutes late. The hall was two-thirds full. The stage contained a red heart shaped bed with phallic pillows and a tacky neon sign. The show began.

First, I noticed that the musicians were cleverly concealed off in a corner. I thought maybe it's because Kevan really was going to fulfill those erotic desires on stage behind the piano. A maitre d' introduced the band and it launched into the title tune—a dynamite oldie but goodie. The sound was great. Suddenly the bed was disturbed as Carole Pope emerged wearing a black leather bondage outfit. I drooled in appreciation. If only my mother could grow to like her.

The magic, electric, sultry, sordid, kinky, downright erotic aura was dispelled as a three hundred pound transvestite pranced on stage. Divine had arrived. The crowd went wild (the sickies). He she it why marched up and down and after Carole sang

"Auto-Erotic Love", that hunk of beef sang the same tune in a voice that reminded one of what happens when you gargle using tar-sands from Alberta. The whole spectacle was reduced from honest-to-goodness kinky rhythm'n'blues to a pitiful joke. The skits were in poor taste, were poorly executed and all of a sudden I realised that my band was putting on a lousy show.

All was not lost however. When that bloated blimp from New York left the stage, Carole and the boys belted out fine renditions of fave raves such as "Surrender", "Birds Of A Feather", and "Take Me". I could even take the semi-nude man on a leash during "Butch" but Divine was unforgivable.

Rough Trade are a band that can make it on their music and stage show alone. They don't need fat male females and they don't need to throw underwear into the audience. Take away the revue junk and deep down there's a great show. As it was, Restless Underwear was mediocre. They say love means never having to say you're sorry, but this time Carole, I want a written apology.

Neil Michael Davidson

Richter wakes up and rolls over Beethoven

Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Op. 2, No. 1 in F minor and Op. 10, No. 3 in D major. Sviatoslav Richter, piano (Angel S-37266).

Sviatoslav Richter's perverse avoidance of late Beethoven makes me wonder whether the Russian pianist spends his leisure hours reading all of Tolstoy except War and Peace. In 1960 he cut a magnificent Op. 57 for RCA (VICS-1478) but has since not attempted anything as demanding. This Angel recording of Op. 10 No. 3 (arguably the best of the early sonatas) is Richter's most significant solo Beethoven release in eighteen years. Still I'm puzzled by his choice for the flip side — there are plenty of early sonatas more challenging than Op. 2 No. 1.

The disc is nevertheless interesting — not only because of the strength and personality of the playing, but because of its unusual backdrop of textual hyperconservatism. Richter chooses, for instance, to play the second repeats of the sonata form movements of Op. 2, No. 1, adding six minutes to the work with, in my opinion, no reward for his trouble. He also fools with the grace notes of both sonatas, changing the appoggiaturas to acciaccaturas presumably on musicological as well as aesthetic grounds.

The authenticity complex may be responsible for Richter's slow and tidy readings of the minuetts (as opposed to scherzos) of both sonatas, but the overly stately and moderate first movement of Op. 2 is a toy of his own brain. The best playing — and the Richter I know — appear in the slow movements. Both are beautifully placed, and the celebrated Largo of the D Major Sonata is especially endowed with Richter's blend of power and lyricism. The first and last movements of that sonata are vigorous and polished, although what is gained from such a rhythmically free presentation of the opening of the rondo I don't understand. The sound is a little distant but acceptable.

WORST CONCERT OF THE YEAR

Lightning Hopkins at the New Yorker
This venue has hosted the best and the worst. Hopkins was so drunk that he would play a few bars then fell silent in self-admiration. Joe Mendelson on bass, hung a moon, and the drummer played like he was all cheeks. A show to be forgotten.

So that's it for 1977. Down here at the office, whatever you might think, we're not just white punks on dope. Punk rock went wild in '77 and some of it is worth hearing. Like it or leave it, punk is here to stay. Just remember that way back in the sixties the Stones were thought to be just as untalented, unmusical, and unwashed as the Pistols. Punk does not have to be a way of life, but simply an exciting new form of music.

Anyway that's our poll and we think it's real noisy. If you have any slight disagreements, small additions or you would simply like to disembowel us, send us your hate mail. Please send a photograph. All replies will be treated quite confidentially or we may print both. Happy New Year, you dumb weenies.

A film for all seasons

Who knows what to expect when the phone rings at 4 a.m. and a mysterious voice says "Hey boddly! Want to see a really great feelin, heh heh heh?" in an indistinguishable accent? Ever-ready for excitement and adventure, I threw on my overcoat and hastened to the address supplied. A dingy little garage was the inauspicious setting for the rock 'em sock 'em preview premiere of Catch-22, an adaptation at forty hours' length from Joseph Heller's brilliant novel.

It's just as well I wasn't informed in advance, as nothing could really have prepared me for the experience, especially since the print was being shipped reel by reel to Cannes and so there was no time for any breaks in the showing. Foreseeing our needs, the theatre managers had supplied for us jars filled with mulched up popcorn and soda pop with which they fed us intravenously throughout the film, and also attachments to penis and sphincter, so that it was possible for this reviewer to answer the call of nature without missing Mae West's stirring appearance as General Dreedle's secretary (opposite W.C. Fields as Dreedle, and Cary Grant as Colonel Moodus).

Many of the people connected with the production were also present at the screening. Dr. Castaneda, the casting director, remarked how fortunate it was that he had a workable tap into one of the major time-warps and so was able to select his cast not simply from our own time but from the ages. Recalling the stunning performances of Dr. Sigmund Freud as Doc Daneeka, and the definitive rendering of Chaplain Tappman by sensitive, moody and romantic young up-and-comer Jesus Christ, one could only nod one's head in eager assent. (Fans of the Messianic Nazarene will be pleased to hear that his gifts as an actor are nothing short of miraculous. He mentioned that he was pleased to take the role, not merely because of the "opportunity to invest my talents and watch them grow", but because the call had come just in time to get him out of rather a tight spot in old Jerusalem.)

Fyodor Dostoyevsky confessed that he was "pleased and tormented" with his performance as Captain John Yossarian, "although I was very sorry to have to lose my beard for the role — many ticks were left homeless, and several positively obliterated from this earth." God, the associate producer, turned a deaf ear to these complaints, muttering, "Ahh, Fyodor — go write a novel!"

Howard Hughes gives an intriguing interpretation of Major Major, having stipulated in his contract that he was only to be filmed when he is not in the picture, and not under any circumstances to be filmed while he is there.

Carl Jung gives a collectively unconscious portrait of a doctor whose specialty is acute meningitis, and Jack Nicholson and Marlon Brando are engaging as Doc Daneeka (Sigmund Freud)'s aides Gus and Wes. Mick Jagger is sterling as air captain McWatt, literally singing "What the hell!", and James Fox compelling as Kid Sampson. Geronomo commands the scene as Chief White Halfat — particularly hilarious and seething is the scene where, at nine months, he blows his Gerber's all over a geologist.

Robert de Niro, when asked to comment on his plum role as the psychopathic Havermeyer, said "I don't particularly like guys who blow little rats to pieces with dum-dum bullets — but that's not my job on the screen. I understand my character and play into his core." Edgar Allan Poe gives a manically comic turn to the role of Hungry Joe, shouting "Nevermore, nevermore!" each time he completes his required number of missions. It is said Mr. Poe choreographed and himself directed the nightmares in which he dreams of being smothered by Major Huple's Cat (played by Alice Pleasance Liddell). Orson Welles is riveting as Colonel Cathcart and his tent. Machiavelli is scintillatingly pragmatic in his role as Colonel Korn. Napoleon is demonic, witty and finicky as General P.P. Peckem, and his minister Cauvin is an engagingly inept Colonel Cargill. "And he made all those mistakes himself, nobody coached him!" marvels Napoleon of his attractively weakened admirer whom he led about on a short golden chain during production.

Hitler gives an extraordinary performance as the dog getting the shit kicked out of it in the streets of Rome, and Eva Braun was engaging as the shit that gets kicked out of the dog. Leni Reifenstahl attempts to intervene to save the dog but is chased away with a snarl by its owner (a cameo appearance of the associate producer himself).

Faye Dunaway is Nurse Sue Ann Duckett, and Raquel Welch plays her tits. Voltaire is the old man in the warehouse and Nately's father while

The residential complex in this painting was destroyed. Sorta.

Nately is played by the young Buster Keaton and his whore is smokily rendered by Monica Vitti. Anna Magnani is the old woman who runs the whorehouse, and Jane Fonda the maid in the lime-green panties who is thrown to her death by Roger Vadim as Aarfy. Jeanne Moreau plays Luciana, and I understand there was romance offscreen as well as on between her and Yossarian (Fyodor Dostoyevsky). Dostoyevsky denies all such rumours: "existentially — that is, they may be true, but I'm not obliged to believe it." Nietzsche is broodingly magnificent as the mood of the soldiers before the Great Big Siege of Bologna, "although I'll have to admit I had a lot of coaching from Marlon and Jack" he adds with a twinkle. Trimalchio is fat and pretty as Milo Minderbinder, and Caligula does multiple duty as all the knives in the story. "As you can see," remarks Castaneda, "we made a few innovations in our method of casting."

John Keats (chosen over Chatterton with considerable vacillation) and Lord Byron played the contents of his stomach. Shelley was the soldier whose name is Mudd and who does not exist.

A multitude of directors were employed in the filming. Singular was Pier Paolo Pasolini's resonant, unearthly beautiful evocation of the funeral, where the Chaplain (Jesus Christ) has the vision of the man he never finds out is Yossarian (Fyodor Dostoyevsky), naked in a chestnut tree (the tree of life, and of knowledge of good and evil too). "Although Fyodor insisted on wearing a body stocking "less for reasons of modesty than to avoid anybody puking" as he remarked to me cordially. Ms. Moreau was far more generous to the great Russian novelist, simply muttering "What a man!" and drawing her breath in with an audible sigh.) Dostoyevsky himself directed the scene in the Eternal City, and it's the goddamndest thing you ever saw (with apologies to the associate producer). Hands come out of fog with knives (Caligula honed sharp) in them and guns, prostitutes and tragic holy men in cassocks wander by reciting soliloquies at a huge orange nightlight or moon, and Yossarian looks on and wonders from whom he can borrow a kopeck, where is the nearest bridge to jump from, and whether it would help if he took up the fiddle. Then he falls asleep and dreams of devouring children made of chocolate filled with cotton batting, crunchy buttertut and blood, and of the drum rolls of distant armies from a world in another dimension at the other end of the universe. I leave it to the reader's imagination to guess how John Huston would handle the interrogation of the Chaplain, and of Clevinger, (Immanuel Kant), or Luis Bunuel in collaboration with Werner Herzog the recurring religious debates, or Louis Malle the scenes in the whorehouse, or Lina Wertmüller the rape of Jane Fonda by Roger Vadim and Milo Minderbinder's strafing of his own base. D.W. Griffith was in charge of organizing the whole spectacle into one creative unity.

At forty hours the film did seem a trifle overlong, although I'm not at all sure what could have been cut. Perhaps my feeling is owing less to my sense of the aesthetic failings of the production, than to my dismay at certain stains which I have been unable since to get out of my suit, as a result of leaks in the jars.

God's next project is a remake of Love Story "this time as a super-spectacular, a combination musical comedy and biblical epic like the Book of Jonah in the Old Testament, with a cast of millions, and in a featured role, the ever-popular Black Plague. Realism will be the key in this production." "Asked if he had any ambitions to direct, God said, "No, no, I'm quite satisfied with the producer's role, and the right of final cut."

Holbein: Ambivalence and clarity of faith

(Images from the Old Testament, Hans Holbein, the younger, Paddington, paperback, $5.95)

"How did Paul know him for sure? Well, he looked a little like the Thomas More of Holbein's portrait which Paul had studied, but only a little. All portraits by Holbein look more like Holbein than like their subjects. But Thomas More was a man who would always be recognized."

—R.A. Lafferty
Past Master

I don't know how many of you are into picture books, but I want to recommend to you a really marvelous new one in paperback, and the price is not too prohibitive, $5.95, if you've been given any Christmas money it's a good investment — Hans Holbein's Images from the Old Testament. Hans Holbein is a gifted painter and illustrator from the Early Renaissance who at the beginning of his career was patronized by Erasmus (who recognized his genius when Holbein was yet only 17) and the Dutch humanists, later became a court painter for Henry VIII and a friend of Sir Thomas More. He has left portraits of each of these three, including an ingrown, sloe-eyed Henry VII which is perhaps as great a masterpiece of contempt but lightly concealed as the famous group portrait by Goya of an aristocratic family in which they all, even the children, come out looking like frogs with their flesh bleached pinkish-white. If R.A. Lafferty is correct and Holbein's portraits really do end up looking more like Holbein than like his subjects, then Holbein must have sought his likeness of Henry in his most negative feelings about the very darkest aspects of his character — whereas the portraits of Sir Thomas More and Erasmus would come more from a highly articulated ambivalence towards himself, balanced slightly more to the positive in the first instance, to the negative a little more inclined in the second.

He has also left a towering masterpiece in his painting of the dead Christ in his tomb — a painting which the introduction of Images from the Old Testament misrepresents grossly "... an unstintingly accurate depiction of the human corpse in which the effects of death only enhance the grandeur of this figure." Go take a look at the painting in some library copy of reproductions from the Renaissance masters: tell me whether the effects of death enhance the grandeur of the figure, or whether they enhance its deadness. I think the latter, as did Dostoyevsky in The Idiot, and it was in this fact, paradoxically, that Dostoyevsky saw the greatness of this painting and, in a weird way, its affirmation. For Dostoyevsky argued that if Christ was not like this in death, then the resurrection was no more than a pallid joke, a conjuror's trick of cosmic proportions but of no significance. But one can go even further than this. Balanced ambivalence was a key to much of Holbein's work, and it seems as if Holbein in his image of the dead Christ gave equal weight to two balanced possibilities: one, that only if Christ dead had this look of the thoroughly dead, and dead with hope sapped from all pores, did the Resurrection have any meaning; two, that if Christ was so in death, and the Resurrection followed not after, that a hollow laugh rings down through the centuries at the Christian dream of Resurrection through Christ's hollow bones.

Similar ambivalences, even ambivalences on points of central doctrine, in Images from the Old Testament.

There is a gorgeously comic impression of Moses commanded by God to count the Israelites — God's finger points and Moses looks over his shoulder with sweat beads on his furrowed brow, anxiously scanning the gathered throng that he must count. Possibly he is wondering what to do when he runs out of fingers and toes. God in this illustration looks a great deal like Moses though without the horns, and probably very little like Hans Holbein. And what of Joshua looking on contemptuously at the heaped bodies, in armour and thick plated codpiece to crow forth his triumph (is there indeed any other comment to be made on that unspeakably foul butcher?) How pitilessly Holbein forces our eye to the pitiless details of the Old Testament — Adonizedeck having his thumbs cut off by the Israelites for example. One is on the chopping block being made ready, the other gone already, and an eloquent black trickle of blood stains the stump on which that first thumb was severed. David mock-heroically posing over a king he has killed in battle, again with a bit of codpiece armor giving the impression of strutting cock as with Joshua — what is Holbein's attitude in all this? Something far more complicated than the simple mind of a simple illustrator interpreting the Holy books in illustration pious and theologically unsuspect.

But whether we inquire into the ideology of Holbein or leave it by the way, homage is owed to the stately procession of his images. God drawing Eve out of Adam in an Eden thick with animals and winds and all the elements of Heaven in happy chaotic harmony; the sea teeming and either a dog or a pig sleeping beside Adam. The Angel of the Lord casting them from the garden with sword of fire, while death dances beside them playing his guitar. Adam clearing away a tree, with death working along beside him while Eve suckles her babe. The Ark of Noah, a flat rectangular box with one tiny hole looking out upon a vast expanse of water and overhead glowering sky, driftwood bobbing in the water and above the ark a dove with an olive branch but from where? All we see is the vast expanse of water and the sky with its rains just now beginning to abate.

Only the greatest art encourages the human soul to the state described by Mailer in The Fight: "There are so few moments in life when one feels definitely without irony." (Which is not to say that irony in a work of art is inartistic; after all Gulliver's Travels is one of the works in English that produces this sense Mailer is describing — one is left with a profound ironic statement about the human condition and in this sense there is irony evoked, and towards the book and its perceptions on human life and the sense of truth and proportion in its rhetoric of corrosive fire, the feeling is clear and plain and without irony.) That is what Holbein leaves you feeling in Images from the Old Testament. Paddington is to be congratulated for its series "Masterpieces of the Illustrated book" if this is any exemplar of the quality of the books in general and the care taken in their just reproductions.

Spring in Toronto is traditionally much more heavily booked than the fall, and schedule conflicts like next Thursday's will soon become maddeningly frequent. This week however is pretty slow. Tonight is Massey Hall Feldbrill and violinist Hamoo Fujiwara repeat Tuesday's program of Wieniawski's Second Concerto, Britten's Frank Bridge Variations, and Hindemith's Mathis der Maler. Rush at 7:00, starts at 8:30.

Sunday at three, the Music Faculty offers a program of Frenches (Faure, Poulenc, Rameau) with soprano Rosemarie Landry, flutist Suzanne Shulman, and organist Douglas Bodle. Students $3 in Walter Hall. The "theme" of the CJRT Festival Concert that evening is a bit of a weird one — nocturnal music. Selections by Mozart and Mendelssohn, and the premiere of R. Murray Schafer's "Hymn to Night". Ryerson theatre at 8:00, rush seats $3.

Next Tuesday and Wednesday, Davis and pianist Louis Lortie preview the program they're taking to China with the TSO. Liszt First Concerto, Brahms Haydn Variations, Beethoven's Fifth. Massey Hall, rush at 7:00.

Japanese pianist Mitsuko Uchida (1975 Leeds runner-up) plays a very interesting program of Haydn, Chopin, Schoenberg and Berg. Thursday at 1:30 in St. Andrew's Presbyterian (King and Simcoe Streets), students $2.

Two vocal recitals Thursday night at 8:30. In the St. Lawrence Centre, Canadian soprano Gaelyn Gabors sings Purcell, Strauss, Schubert, Debussy, and a seldom-heard chamber work by Shostakovich, $5.50 and $6.50. In Massey Hall, Leontyne Price sings Strauss, Rachmaninoff, Verdi, Mozart and others. Leontyne prices start at $5.

Friday: Starting from the bottom we find, amid the sludge and residue of the last show, that U of T Films is showing Murder by Death and Harold and Maude. Only slightly closer to the surface there is the New Yorker which is foisting off its collection of rock shorts which feature The Beatles, John & Yoko, Jimi Hendrix, and Cream. The mud clears a bit but there's a haze which might be over-exposure surrounding Lumiere's bill of The Maltese Falcon and Casablanca. The same applies to the Revue which offers Welles' most famous film, Citizen Kane, and his best The Magnificent Ambersons. Floating to the top, as usual, is the Science Centre (Toronto's answer to the Northwest Passage) which has somehow smuggled in a print of von Stroheim's Footloose Wives, which does not feature at Lumiere and U of T. The New Yorker stays down in the depths with two Monty Python nuisances Completely Different and Holy Grail. The only advantage of bills like that is that the people who go aren't out on the street to meet decent folks. The Revue, on the other hand, caters to lovers of family life with two quiet peasants to incest: Malle's Murnau of the Heart and Tacchella's Cousin, Cousine.

Sunday: Neither Innis nor the AGO is back in gear so things are easier. The New Yorker has a marginally good film in The Late Show (but only because it's about a detective) and one interminable star vehicle in New York, New York (which makes Lisa Minelli look like a black hole).

Monday: The Revue's family fun bill continues through Wednesday. The New Yorker repeats. And Lumiere panders to the trendies who don't mind tedium as long as it's in German with Fassbinder's The Merchant of Four Seasons and Schlöndorff's A Free Woman. Bring your aesthetico-political consciousnesses.

Tuesday: The New Yorker tries to pretend it's a TV set with Godfather 1 & 2 (it goes down better for free, believe me). The Science Centre starts three nights of films from India with The Forest which concerns the rivalry between two villages as perceived by a child. Everyone else repeats.

Wednesday: OISE finally gets under way with two by Fassbinder: The Fox and His Friends and The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant. Hurry up folks, the people who count are already labelling him overrated. In a month or two you won't be able to impress your friends. (If you plan to go to the OISE series regularly they have series cards which can save you lotsa bux.) Lumiere has two early Fellinis Toby Dammit and 8½ while the New Yorker continues its display of unparalleled taste with two recent Ken Russell's The Music Lovers and Valentino. The Science Centre offers Two Faces: Indecision which is about a ghost who enters a bridegroom's body and comes down with terminal angst.

Thursday: The New Yorker displays Rudolf Nureyev doing what he does best in I Am A Dancer and what he does worst in Valentino. Too bad you have to pay for both. Rumour has it that U of T Films makes a lot of money. Let's hope they make enough to send their programmers far far away 'cause in the meantime they'll be showing stuff like New York, New York and Lenny. Maybe we could take up a collection. OISE has two by Jean Vigo the inevitable Zéro de Conduite and the too seldom seen L'Atlantide. The Science Centre's Indian tour ends with Down a film about trains with third class carriages. And to end the week the Revue starts a run of Rohmer's Marquise of O... which has been the subject of some debate. If you don't like Rohmer, don't go. If you do chances are 50-50 you won't like it one. If you read Kleist you should curl up in the comfy chair with 'Michael Kohlhaas'. If you feel the way I do you'll pack it in, buy a pick-up ...

The Art Gallery of Ontario won't get back into gear until the middle of the month, when we'll get the National Gallery's travelling show of 19th century British watercolours and an extensive showing of Lawren Harris's work. It's strongest holdover show is an exhibition of David Levine's satirical drawings — mercilessly amusing and educational, yet. Till Jan. 15. Opening tomorrow, a show called InVideo combines video productions from 23 artists from across Canada. It celebrates 10 years of history as an art form, despite objections from numerous schools of art. Suzi Lake is also featured as a video-photographic artist from Montreal. Both shows till Feb. 26. Graphic artist, Robert Motherwell, shows selected prints at the gallery till Sunday.

Hart House won't re-open until Wednesday with a show of paintings and drawings by Mimi Matte. Till Jan. 27. Also on Wednesday, Hart House stages its first of seven lectures on art as a commodity. Buy long, sell short? 7 p.m. in the Bickerteth Room at Hart House.

Next door, at the Price Arthur Galleries, Philadelphia artist Joseph Hirsch who is a leading component of contemporary representational art. Till Jan. 28.

Hello Jazz Fans! This column begins more and more to resemble an obituary, as Toronto's young jazz clubs one by one meet their demise. The latest victim is DJ's Tavern, which abandoned its short-lived jazz policy on Monday. My aesthetic sensibility rebels at this retrograde step: the club has deteriorated into a disco, that most crass of all cultural corruptions. All dedicated fans are urged to console this writer for his every-dwindling number of free passes (now down to zero).

Listings this week: At Bourbon St., trumpeter singer drunkard Jack Sheldon entertains the diners until Saturday. Sheldon performed until recently for the Merv Griffin show. Next week brings in the unique style of trumpeter Ruby Braff.

Excellent flautist Mo Koffman leads his superb quintet at George's tonight and tomorrow, making way for Sammy Noto's trumpet on Monday.

At Cafe Soho, home of the legitimate and the true, manager Frank Houchen presents Peter Letich (guitar) and his group after hours tonight and tomorrow. Next Thursday after hours features Mike White on trumpet. 334 Queen W., 862-0199. As usual, the Canadian Creative Music Collective perform their improvisations every Tuesday and Friday at the Music Gallery, 30 Patrick St., 598-2400.

BIC's Coffee House at 11 Yorkville is now advertising a jazz workshop. Call them at 923-2943 for information.

So here we are, back to school and firmly entrenched in the post-December concert slump. Unless you like Al Martino, who will be at Massey Hall on Feb. 1st, the only thing of any importance on the calendar is the Carla Bley Band at the New Yorker on Feb. 1st. She is an underground avant garde type who you probably have never heard of, but rumour has it that she will be well worth catching.

While speaking of rumours, rumour has it that Ted Nugent, Kiss (naturrellment), the Sex Pistols and the Ramones will all be appearing in our fair city in short time. But who trusts rumours?

At the clubs, things are not much more promising. Tonight Larry's has Lim Hart, The El Mocambo has Cueball (I've been told they're okay, but their name has scared me away to date), the Chimney has the Hunt (pitiful stuff), the Gasworks has Hot Rots, the Colonial has the Dutch Mason Blues Band (they're not bad), the ol' Jarvis house has Charity Brown and the Midwest Cuckoo has Eugene Smith and The Warm Up Band. Geronimo's, out in the boonies, has the incomparable Zon.

C.P.I. has implemented its computerized ticket outlets, which are called BASS, and has located them in several major shopping malls throughout the city and the suburbs. Some of us have grave qualms about the value and practicality of this system, but we will hold our tongues until we see how things turn out.

Meanwhile, Led Zep impersonators, Triumphs, will be at Dr. John's tonight.

With every new year come new productions. Unfortunately, the Toronto theatre scene seems to be a little slow in starting. Let's hope this isn't a continuing trend. Opening next week, a revival of George F. Walker's Beyond Mozambique, again produced at the Factory Theatre Lab, Monday through Sunday, matinee on Sunday, student prices ranging between $3.50 and $4.50. At the Bathurst St. Theatre, Bryan Wade's Breakthrough dealing with the affair between Tom Thomson and Frances Warren, previews tonight and opens the 7th. Shows will run Tuesday through Sunday, with Wednesday and Sunday matinees.

The University, for once, appears to be keeping up with the professionals. On Monday a production of Sheridan's comedy, The Critic, is to open at the Glen Morris Street Studio Theatre. It runs Monday through Saturday at 8:30 p.m. with a Sunday matinee at 2:30. Admission is free for all, but reservations (978-8668) are suggested. Also look out for the upcoming production of Volpone at Hart House.

Otherwise, the output is about as cool as the weather. Very cold, in fact. All alternate theatres seem to be rehearsing for upcoming goodies and commercially there is only a very dry Simon comedy, California Suite, at exorbitant Royal Alex prices and a touring Goldsmith comedy, She Stoops to Conquer at the O'Keefe Centre for those who missed the brilliant Stratford production several years ago or wish to forget last season's fiasco at Toronto Truck.

Oh, well, if nothing else, it gives us something to look forward to. I hope.

WATSGOINGUP — construction,
WATSUP — renovation,
WATSDOWN — demolition.

(pause)

Okay folks, world's first architectural WATSUP column. The School of Architecture is holding its very own Event Week, the title: A Competition: Designs for the Don Jail Properties. Since the jail has become one of the city's endangered dinosaurs the folks at the school have figured they should see what they can do with it. One and all are invited to come help and see what the school is about at the same time.

The schedule goes as such: the problem will be introduced this Wednesday, the 11th, at noon in the School of Architecture, 230 College Street (at Huron). At this point students and visitors will form design groups and the itinerary for the next week and a half will be announced. There are attempts being made to arrange a site visit sometime this week and design work will be carried out in the studios at the school on a part-time basis during the week. The following Monday the 16th to Wednesday the 18th all regular work in the studios will be suspended and people will concentrate on schemes for the reuse of the jail properties.

Wednesday, ten schemes will be selected for presentation to a panel of guest critics including New York architect Michael Graves. He will also give a lecture that evening entitled Fragments. In addition there'll be a party, movies for your edification and pleasure, a prize for the best Don Jail scheme and much, much more! And it's all free. For more info. call 978-6143 and ask for Tom Tobson, Denise Gendron or me, Mark Michasiw.

Tonight on channel 4 at 11:30, Ken Russell's most recent opus Get Back starring Roger Daltrey and Catherine Deneuve. Katie tickles Roger's tocatà. At the same time on channel 7, one of Fellini's earlier and most incomprehensible films Wazzamatta, has Luigi Bordonello battling obscure imagery. For all you insomniacs, Peter Gzowski is interviewing a worm rancher, a bellybop at the Royal York, and Slappo the trained seal. For prime time viewers, National Geographic is presenting a documentary on barnacles, channel 19 at 8.

Saturday means football. In a quarter-final playoff for a berth in the semi-finals, the Denver Broncos take on the Washington Redskins. It should be a biggie. This is followed by the Milton Berle Open where Jack Biliotic tees off against Totie Fields. See it all on channel 9. Don't put away the chip dip because The Brezhnev Bombers go up against the Picton Flyers in world hockey excitement at 8 on channel 6, colour commentary will be provided by Peter Puck. If you're not into sport, try catching Bowling For Bowling's Sake at 9:30 on channel 3.

Sunday means religious programs and reruns. Love The Lord at 12 on channel 1 is presenting Dino, the world's most talented Christian ukelele player. Watch him pray and play, while drinking a glass of holy water and chewing wafers. Meanwhile channel 11 is featuring a four-hour episode of Gilligan's Island where Gilligan Knocks up Marianne. Will the professor pull the plug? Don't forget Rocket Robin Hood and Mr. Dressup when he gives Finnegan a tab of acid.

On Monday we've got Star Trek at 4:00 on channel 11. The Enterprise is caught in a rapidly deteriorating orbit around a hostile planet because Dr. McCoy has snorted the dithium crystals. Meanwhile it's Spock's poor far (mating season) and he surprises Sulu. On Happy Days at 7:00, Richie finds out he has a social disease. Not cool, nurd. On a controversial episode of Family Affair Mr. French is unamused when Jodie has a wet dream.

Tuesday starts off on a serious note with a CBC expose on corruption amongst crossing guards. That's at 8:00 on channel 5. On Donny and Marie, the Green Bay Packers make a 'surprise' appearance and Donnie sings a duet with Benji.

Wednesday has a pilot for a new show called Luke Em'la. David Soul is Luke, a crusty but benign detective restricted to a plastic bubble by a serious blood disease. In this episode he is mailed a corpse.

On Thursday, John Boy Walton loses his freckle. On Welcome Back Kotter Vinnie gets the poon farr and surprises Kotter — in front of the class! On All In The Family Archie is upset because black Siamese twins move in next door and open a Mexican food place. Gloria is raped by a drunken homosexual who mistakes her for a man. Celebrity Bowling pits Johnny Winter against Ray Charles. In the season premier of Hospital, immigrant surgeon Han Mescalpel gets the words lobotomy and tonsillectomy confused. Meanwhile Polly Dent, head nurse, falls in love with an electroencephalograph. Shocking. And in the last episode of The Prisoner, Number 6 is told that he is actually Number 23, and is forced to throw away all his monogrammed suits, while Number 1 turns out to be Al Waxman.

X-Country Team Works Hard

By GLYNIS PETERS

How do cross-country skiers train on a downtown campus? They improvise, take advantage of the Christmas vacation and rely on self-discipline. At the winter camp held for the team in Haliburton this Christmas all the above and more was demonstrated. Although the team starts to train officially in September, the camp is the first opportunity to get on skis for many of them.

What do they do without any snow? Coach Veli Niinimaa emphasizes distance running to improve cardiovascular fitness. "Cross-country skiers are the fittest athletes in the world," he claims, but this means training five or six hours a day, something impossible for a student to do. Self-discipline is essential when one is training alone for months, before even seeing snow. Some of the more advanced skiers may take to roller skis, but the majority hit the track and hope for winter.

In the second term, back campus offers the team a half kilometre loop but is at the winter training camp that this group of individuals becomes a team.

This year 6 women and 14 men logged an average of 200 kilometres each over 6 days, skiing from morn to dusk with a break only for healthy feasts. The day involved interval training, distance work and technique improvement, while the evenings were taken up with seminars on training or technique. The self-discipline developed in those lonely miles in the fall showed in the way the team used all their time at the camp to utmost advantage.

Two races held during the week gave a good indication of where the talent lies on the team. It isn't surprising that captain, Andre LaPlante, and Coach Niinimaa led the men and captain Susan Rowley led the women. Paul Stapleton and Paul Kempainen, strong veterans, will be definite contenders as well as several other strong skiers who were unable to make the camp.

This year is the first for official women's competition and U of T has several strong skiers as well as a great deal of potential. Last year Toronto placed 4 women in the top ten. This season, Heather Chrysdale and Janice Parrott will be giving Rowley a run for her money, with Taru Paakkonen expected to maintain the consistency she has shown in the past.

The team competes every week-end from now until the beginning of March but each race will see a different selection of competitors. An official team is never picked leaving the opportunity for younger competitors to improve and compete later in the season. Because of this system, Niinimaa feels that there is always room for new skiers, although the motto of the team is year round training, with a strong commitment.

Talking about the development of this sport at U of T and in Canada, Niinimaa feels there is little base for growth. Canada is not keeping up with progress either in training techniques and facilities or coaching and this naturally affects the University level. This year is the first time that people have been drawn in any significant number from the junior ranks, a result of the introduction of the sport into the high schools. Although the level of University skiing has definitely improved over the last few years Niinimaa feels one cannot both ski at a high level of competition and attend school.

This week-end the team competes in the Muskoka Loppet which is an open race. Only three of the season's competitions are strictly University races but many open races have University divisions.

It is only at the OUA finals that a team is set, when 6 men and 6 women are selected on previous performances to compete. The men race a distance of between 10 and 15 kilometres and the women cover either 5 or 10 kilometres. The equivalent on back campus is anywhere from 10 to 30 laps and Niinimaa would like to mention in passing that people walking on the track ruin it for any training at all.

They train alone for almost half of their season without snow, they pay themselves for an invaluable training camp and they buy their own skis, which must be racing skis if they wish to be competitive. Against all odds however, this is definitely a team to be reckoned with.

Students Dump Czechs

By JIM O'LEARY

To read the Toronto papers you would hardly know that a Canadian hockey team has just completed one of the most successful European tours of the last decade. The Canadian Student National team recently returned from a nine-game undefeated tour of Czechoslovakia and West Germany to be greeted with negative headlines in the Toronto press.

Despite the success of the team, the headlines centered on the fact that Hockey Canada got their dates mixed up and thought the team was to compete in a tournament in Grenoble, France, at the end of December. Three weeks before leaving, it was realized that the tournament was to be at the end of December, 1978.

By this time the Student Nationals were committed to play a series of exhibition games in Czechoslovakia so the trip went on as planned with games against West German teams being substituted for those originally planned for Grenoble.

Hockey Canada, a federal government agency, granted the Student Nationals $50,000 for training and travelling expenses. The Globe reported that this meant that "22 Canadian intercollegiate players were in Europe at the taxpayers' expense."

Actually, however, it cost the taxpayers virtually nothing to send the collegians to Europe. Hockey Canada is a self-supporting agency. It raises its revenue from international tournaments such as the Canada Cup in which it took in $1.3 million.

The report in the Globe also failed to mention that the brunt of the cost of the tour was paid by the Czechoslovakian Ice Hockey Federation. All food, accommodation and travelling expenses were picked up by the Czechs.

The reason the Student Nationals were originally intended to compete in Grenoble was to give them international hockey exposure with the intent that if they did well they would be viewed as a potential source for the Olympic team in 1980. As part of the agreement which arranged the Canada Cup, Canada is committed to ice an amateur team for the Lake Placid Olympics.

Although they did not compete in Grenoble, the Student Nationals still gained the international exposure which was intended. Officials at Hockey Canada must be overjoyed at the results because not only were they exposed to the European style, but the Canadians won nine straight games.

The Student Nationals, which had seven U of T players on the squad, swept five games from the Czechs, winning three from teams in their first Division League, and twice against the National 18-year old team.

Coach Tom Watt, of the U of T, felt the Czechs may have underestimated the Canadians. While the first division clubs are good teams, they are a step lower than the Czech's top competitors from the Elite Division.

For the last game of the series, the Czechs bolstered the team with seven Elite players which produced the best game of the series, a 4-3 Canadian victory. Watt was somewhat disappointed that they didn't get more games with Elite competition.

Besides being successful on the scoresheet, the Canadians received praise from the Czechs for their deportment on the ice. Watt was pleased to report that unlike some recent Canadian teams in Europe, no Canadian was involved in a violent incident. On the whole the Canadian team kept their cool very well despite some flagrant fouls by the opposition.

Watt feels that because of this, "when Hockey Canada reviews our team they will be really pleased." Watt paid special attention to temperament when selecting players and instructed them to stick to hockey to avoid the incidents which have given Canadian hockey a bad name throughout Europe.

In the coming years Watt believes whenever a Canadian team is sent overseas, a greater emphasis will be placed on picking players who combine sportsmanship with skill. Hockey Canada feels it is very important for our Olympic team to avoid any ugly scenes when the eyes of the world are on us at Lake Placid.

Watt is confident that a student team would do very well in the Olympics. Thinking back to 1976 Watt says that "I know we could have fielded a team which could have won a bronze."

The reason for this assessment is the success of the American team. Comprised of university players, the Americans finished in a tie for third place but lost the bronze to West Germany on the basis of goal spread.

Watt believes that Canada could ice a stronger student team than the Americans did in '76. While this team would be hard pressed to beat the Russians and Czechs, it would be right up there in the battle for the Bronze.

Interfac Game of The Week and Comments

By JIM McLEAN

It seems as the New Year commences the Interfaculty Hockey teams have resolved to settle down and play some good calibre hockey. Indicative of this was the game between Phys Ed and New College played Wednesday night at Varsity Arena. Along with some good refereeing, both teams battled in a game which could have easily gone either way.

The first period seemed to drift by quite uneventfully until Albert Camafra of New College popped one in on a breakaway. Not more than two minutes later Phys Ed retaliated with a goal by P. Turner.

Throughout the first period Phys Ed seemed to dominate New College in their own end. A more physically aggressive approach by Phys Ed appeared to leave some of the New College players wary of their opponents. But New College, aided greatly by their consistent goaltending, prevented a seemingly inevitable onslaught of Phys Ed goals.

The second period appeared as a complete turnaround with Camafra earning a goal in a scramble and then coming back with a fine shot to give him a well deserved Hat trick. But not being satisfied with just a hat trick he banged in a fourth to give New an apparent insurmountable 4-1 lead.

The result of this goal-a-minute offensive seemed to leave Phys Ed disoriented until they came back with a well executed goal by J. Andrews from M. McCarthy.

To add to the Phys Ed comeback A. Mathews slapped one in to make it 4-3 with eight minutes remaining. This apparently gave Phys Ed the moral lift they needed to put and keep themselves in the game.

The rest of the game seemed to be played in vain by Phys Ed as they couldn't buy a goal. As Camafra put it, "both teams played well with a decision that could have gone either way."

Aside from one New College casualty the game was well played by both teams physically and mentally. All players seemed to be taken by the emotion stirred from everyone's never say die attitude.

As a final note I would like to comment on the interfac refereeing.

In the past the interfaculty hockey league is said to have less than adequate officiating. I suppose after seeing a majority of this and last year's game it is safe to say there is room for some improvement.

The refs in the New-Phys Ed game on the other hand were excellent examples of what "first class" refereeing is. The game was rough and therefore exciting because the refs didn't try to ruin it by calling cheap penalties. Throughout the game they used their discretion when the option of allotting penalties arose.

Doug Caines Back In Form

By HUGH STUART

Last season, Varsity Blues center Doug Caines scored 18 goals and had 23 assists. Not a bad rookie season by anyone's standards. But Caines' performance was sensational in view of the fact that due to an injury he only played in twenty-two games. A glance at this season's Ontario college hockey scoring race shows that Caines has resumed his torrid pace of last year. In nine games he has 14 goals and 16 assists to lead the league.

The impressive performance of the second year Physical Education student is not surprising in light of the credentials that he brought with him to U of T. Caines played two seasons of Junior A hockey at St. Catharines and then was a fifth round draft choice of the NHL New York Rangers. His professional experience consists of one exhibition game against the Philadelphia Flyers but Caines is quick to point out that it was only for one shift... one long shift.

Mid season knee surgery forced Caines to miss a large chunk of last season but he returned in time to make a large contribution in the Blues' post season drive to the national title.

Although the injury forced Caines to miss the Blues' tour of China (he did join the team in Japan), he participated in another tour 'this year as he led the Canadian Student National Team on their successful trip through Europe last month. This team included eight of Caines' Toronto teammates and was coached by Blues' coach Tom Watt. Caines found the trip to be an enjoyable and valuable experience: "The team was strong and team unity was great. European hockey is different altogether to North American because of the larger ice surface and their different style of play. I was able to learn a great deal."

As a former Junior A player, Caines is qualified to provide an insight into the quality of college hockey as compared to Junior A. In his mind there is no doubt that the top college teams are stronger than Junior A. But according to Caines, there is a problem in that there are too many weak teams in college hockey to provide consistently strong opposition for the top teams.

One thing that Caines likes about the college game is that "Hockey isn't the player's whole life like it is in Junior A. There isn't the pressure of worrying about your future in professional hockey because in the end you'll have an education to fall back upon." That statement underscores Caines' reason for coming to U of T in the first place; to get an education.

What about the future? Professional hockey is still a goal and Caines would certainly consider interrupting his studies if the offer was right. But any decisions of that nature will have to wait until the summer when he will have time to think about them. If a North American pro career is not a possibility Caines would also consider giving Europe a shot, but again the offer would have to be right.

In the short run for Caines there are academics and the Blues' quest for the national championship. Regarding the championship, Caines is fully aware that in spite of their number one ranking the Blues cannot win by merely showing up. In other words, the Blues have the talent and the major obstacle may be a mental one. But if he, and linemates Alex Jeans and Dan Tsubouchi can maintain the standard of play that they have established during the first half of this season, the Blues are going to be very tough to stop.

Side Line By-Line

By JIM O'LEARY

It was only two decades ago that Canada sent hockey teams to Europe which completely demolished the opposition, including teams from Czechoslovakia and Russia. Scores in the double figures were not uncommon against teams which were new to the sport and not very good.

While we were winning, everything was rosy, but as the competition improved and we found we could only win by sending our best players, we started to complain about the restrictions which kept most of our best players out of action. The reasoning went that if other teams were allowed to use the best talent available, then so should we.

On the eve of the first Can-Am Bowl which pits Canada's top college football players against some of the top American talent, it seems ironic that it is the Canadians who are moaning about the use of the best talent available in this international competition.

It seems the Canadians would be happy to play against schools of second and third-rate calibre but are fuming over the discovery that the American team will indeed be an all-star squad of first division players. The team includes stars from powerhouse teams such as Michigan State, Alabama, Georgia and Pittsburgh.

The Canadians should not be surprised how things turned out. Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) executives had advance notice that some first division players would be included.

Also, the game is being sponsored by a New York television station. With TV calling the shots the CIAU people should have expected the best people available would be in the lineup. After all, how do you sell a second-rate football game to the American market? The TV people couldn't care less about the Canadian problems when they are concerned about the ratings.

Before you write the game off as the mismatch of the century, however, there are a few things that should be kept in mind.

First of all the game is being played by Canadian rules. The three down rule and the 12 men on the field could cause problems for the Americans.

Many good American quarterbacks have come to the Canadian Football League and have had a hard time adjusting to only three downs. The powerful American offence may look somewhat humbler when the quarterback is forced to average five yards per down rather than three and a bit if he is to keep the ball moving.

Defensively, the extra man in the backfield could be the source of some confusion for the Americans. It does not seem unlikely that a couple of times during the game the defense will confuse their assignments and leave a Canadian receiver wide open.

The Canadian situation is similar to the Russians when they came to play the Canadians in 1972. They have nothing to lose. If they win they are heroes; if they lose, everyone will say "I told you so."

All the pressure is on the Americans. Not only are they expected to win, but they will have to win big to placate the critics.

It should not be forgotten that the Canadians have some very talented ball players. Fullback Jim Reid of the Laurier Golden Hawks gives the Canadians a ball carrier who, according to Hawk coach, Tuffy Knight, is good enough to play in any Big Ten backfield. Quarterback Jamie Bone and tight end Craig Labbett give the Canadians as potent a one-two punch as you are likely to find anywhere.

The biggest concern of many observers is the size of the Americans. Players like Dwight Carey (6'4" 245 lbs.), John Malinoski (6'4", 250), Fred Quinlan (6'4", 240), and Brent Watson (6'5", 250) make the Americans look awesome. A close look at the Canadian team, however, shows that the difference is not as great as some people believe. Team Canada has players like Bob Ferguson (6'2", 240), Ted Milian (6'2", 250), John Miller (6'2", 255) and Doug Redl (6'4", 240).

It looks as if Canadian coach Darwin Semotich is doing his best to con the opposition. While there is certainly reason to be concerned it seems unlikely that he is serious when he predicts that the Canadians will avoid running up the middle and concentrate on passing. With a fullback like Reid (6'3", 215) carrying the ball the Canadians would be crazy to not try to establish the run.

It's unlikely that the Canadians will win, but it shouldn't be too surprising if they keep it respectable. But then again you never know. The Russians were supposed to lose eight straight in 1972.

Library staff to get sabbaticals?

By SEAN DUNPHY

The possibility of granting U of T's 213 librarians a status similar to that enjoyed by the university's teaching staff was raised at a joint meeting of the Academic Affairs Committee and the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council last Thursday.

This special meeting was called to discuss the recommendations of the Working Group to Formulate Policies for Librarians. The question of an official status for librarians has been a thorn in the side of the administration for more than 10 years.

The two most contentious items in the report were the recommendations regarding research and study grants and dismissal for reasons of fiscal need.

At the moment, librarians are permitted a one-year sabbatical every six years at 50 per cent of their salary. The Working Group recommended the salary level be raised to 75 per cent. Currently only three or four librarians per year take advantage of their sabbatical, although 90 per cent are eligible.

The study and research proposals met opposition from many committee members principally for reasons of cost, but also because members were unsure that librarians really need to do as much research as teachers.

Professor Peter Salus questioned whether a Master of Library Science diploma is a research degree in the same way that a PhD is. He estimated that the cost of the proposal could run as high as half a million dollars each year.

Dean Bernard Etkin of Engineering pointed out that when his faculty adopted rules for sabbaticals similar to the ones proposed by the Working Group, research and study leave jumped by more than 100 per cent in three years. Etkin noted that the proposal, as written, puts pressure on the library administrative staff to grant leave, because it states that leave shall not be denied unreasonably, and shall be granted on the basis of merit and staffing needs.

Those in favor of the proposal felt that the procedures for granting leave provided enough safeguards that the administration would not be forced to increase leaves to a detrimental level. The most vocal proponent of the recommendation was television magnate John Bassett. Bassett felt that the 75 per cent salary limit was "cheap". He added that if he were a librarian, he probably would have formed a union years ago.

The refusal of the Working Group to formulate any policy regarding dismissal for reasons of fiscal restraint was unrealistic, according to many committee members. They based their charge on the inevitability of a financial squeeze in education.

The Working Group however decided against including a clause allowing for dismissal of librarians for economic reasons on the grounds that the teaching staff did not have such a provision. It would be unfair to discriminate against the librarians by instituting one, the group concluded.

The Working Group will consider the criticisms offered at the meeting, and produce an amended report to Governing Council in two weeks.

Ex-postal boss slams gov't

By STEPHEN ELLAMS

"There are no Communists on the national executive and we don't want them" declared Joe Davidson, past president of the Canadian union of Postal Workers (CUPW) at a discussion on industrial relations in Canada held at Innis College Town Hall last Friday. Also on the panel was Arthur Kruger, Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science and labor and economics professor.

Davidson, responding to what he called "the call of the wild," has recently returned to union work as technical adviser to CUPW's Ontario regional director after spending three months on the shop floor at an Ottawa post office. During the discussion Davidson relentlessly drove home his point that the transformation of the Post Office into a crown corporation is the only way to end the present chaos in the postal service.

Davidson laid the blame for the present postal situation on "incompetent and dishonest management" who refuse to bargain in good faith. This contention is backed up by the government's own reports, said Davidson, adding that he found it "difficult to understand the refusal of the government to implement the recommendations of these reports."

He slammed the government's consistent refusal to appoint a Royal commission to look into the problems of the Post Office and cited this as evidence that the government has "something to be ashamed of and something to be afraid of." Unequivocal in his attack he claimed that "the apathy of the government (in this situation) is nothing less than criminal."

Kruger said in turn, that the low wages previously paid provided a "justification for militancy," said Kruger, but now "a significant number of people within the union see it as a vehicle of political change rather than an instrument for economic improvement." According to Kruger it is "difficult to achieve agreement with people interested more in spreading the revolution and building a new society than ensuring industrial peace."

Kruger also said that if the Post Office is made into a Crown corporation the government should give some thought to allowing competition. Other Crown corporations such as the CBC have to face competition from the private sector, Kruger said, and the Post Office should be no exception.

Davidson countered that during the 1975 postal strike the union had sent some letters via private courier to Ottawa — at a cost of $3.50 each.

According to Davidson, "the private couriers are only interested in skimming off the cream of the inter-city runs" and are not interested in providing a comprehensive service that includes non-profit routes. Davidson also made the point that when he first started working at the Post Office in 1957 the price of a stamp was the same as the price of a subway ticket. If the public wants a first-class postal service, said Davidson, it will have to be prepared to pay for it.

Davidson said the Post Office's attempts to switch from an archaic to a modern technological system overnight has been a major source of disruption within the Post Office. When a heckler suggested that perhaps the whole of the Post Office be automated Davidson replied: "If the day ever comes when a man is the servant of machine rather than vice-versa, it will be a sorry day indeed."

Ham U of T prexie tomorrow will tell...

A special meeting of the Governing Council, called by its chairman Marjie Pakin for 4:00 p.m. tomorrow, is expected to be the official announcement of the name of the next U of T president.

Notification of the meeting, to be held in the Council Chamber of Simcoe Hall, was sent out last Thursday to all major campus media and governmental organizations.

President-watchers have said that the meeting is designed to prevent the embarrassing information "leaks" that occurred five years ago with the reporting of John Evans as U of T president in the U of T student handbook four months before the official announcement.

Instead, these sources say, an announcement to the assembled campus groups will anticipate any unofficial, if accurate, publication of the next president's name.

Likely candidates have included Ernest Sirluck, former president of the University of Manitoba, Don Forster, president of the University of Guelph, Stefan Dupre, former chairman of the Political Economy Department, James Ham, dean of the School of Graduate Studies, York University president Ian MacDonald and U of T professor Harry Eastman.

Speculation among knowledgeable president-watchers however has singled out Ham as the man. Sources close to the search committee have confidently said his name will be pronounced by the Governing Council tomorrow.

Toronto Star education reporter Harvey Schachter also wrote in an article several weeks ago that Ham was the candidate most likely to succeed. Schachter is recognized as having "very good sources."

Ham was the Dean of Engineering from 1966 to 1973. He was then appointed to head the School of Graduate Studies. His recent report on the school for the Planning and Priorities Committee of the Governing Council is considered to be the ne plus ultra on the subject, his Royal Commission Report on the Health and Safety of Workers in Mines released in August, 1976 has given him useful contacts in the provincial government.

Ham was out-of-town over the weekend and unavailable for comment.

Tell us, Prof. Ham what's your reaction to the rumour you're in line to run U of T?

Truckers may traverse Trinity

By TOM KUHN

The proposed truck route to the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) construction site may go right past the Larkin Administrative Building, and through the Trinity College playing fields, if a recent turn in U of T-ROM negotiations is taken.

Negotiations on the truck route are complicated because three groups are involved, as well as the Metro Roads Commission, Trinity, a federated college, the university, and the museum have been discussing the truck route, earlier proposed for the Philosopher's Walk area, since the end of last year.

U of T president John Evans said the university would not accept a route through university property unless the museum fulfils two preconditions. It must try all direct routes to the construction site on museum property. The route must also not disturb the studies of the faculties of music and law and Trinity College, or the aesthetics of the Philosopher's Walk area.

As a federated college, Trinity has its own board of governors independent of the university. It could take an independent position and say no to the truck route through Trinity playing fields, said Alexander Dalzell, vice-provost of the college.

Trinity has, however, tried to effect arrangements which could reduce noise.

"The Trinity route goes right past the academic building which houses half of the college's classes. It also goes by the north end of Trinity College residence with 100 men residents," Dalzell said.

Dalzell said he hoped that the truck route would come south from Bloor on Devonshire Place. "If the trucks were routed north from Hoskin Street the Devonshire residence as well as St. Hilda's would have trucks rumbling by at 7 o'clock in the morning," he said.

The museum is now awaiting the report from Metro Roads on the direct routes to the construction site. Metro Roads controls access to and from Bloor Street and Queen's Park.

Evans and others have requested the Metro Roads report in writing before they allow access through university property. James Cruise, director of the ROM, said he would receive the Metro report by Wednesday.

Mike paper reborn

St. Michael's College newspaper, The Mike, will hit the streets again this Wednesday after a short lull in publication. It will publish once every four weeks until the end of March.

Editor Joanne Green and Co-Editor Anne-Marie Turnbull as well as 20 staffers buckled down this term to revive The Mike. One orientation issue appeared in September, however, interest in producing the paper petered out until recently.

The Mike does not normally come out on a regular basis. However, this term it will publish January 11, February 8, March 8 and 29. It will cover activities at St. Mike's as well as campus events, from politics to art and cultural activities.

Committees join: bold step

By SEAN DUNPHY

The special joint meeting of the Planning and Resources committee and the Academic Affairs Committee on Thursday was regarded by many to be a "dry run" for Recommendation number 14 of the External Review of the Governing Council.

The review, written by Jack Macdonald, director of the Addiction Research Foundation, is being officially published today in the administration's newspaper The Bulletin. It states that these two committees could be effectively combined into one: the Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning.

This body, as recommended in the Macdonald Report, would comprise 61 members. Thursday's meeting saw approximately 35 committee members discussing the report, an unusually large number for a Governing Council standing committee meeting.

How well was the committee able to function with its swollen membership? Innis College principal William Saywell, member of the Planning and Resources Committee, said the meeting was an excellent example of the need to join the two committees permanently.

The time has passed, he said, when the university can consider academic matters without also considering their fiscal implications. He felt, however, that a more realistic size for the proposed committee would be about 40 members. Numbers aside, he said, "I think that it is a splendid recommendation."

Student Michael Treacy, vice-president of the Academic Affairs Committee, agreed that the meeting was "excellent", but opposed the idea of a permanent joint committee.

Treacy explained that the wide variety of issues the two committees would have to deal with might not be of interest to all members. Consequently, he said, attendance at meetings would suffer.

Professor Maurice Lister of the Planning and Resources Committee said the size of the joint committee as recommended in the Macdonald Report is "unwieldy".

He said Thursday's meeting "did what it intended to do — allow a lot of people to hear and to speak about an issue." But he said that the times when controversial issues are voted on really determine a committee's effectiveness.

Feminists: Go where the money is

By CHRIS STADDON

Women should try to bring about changes in society by wielding their dollar power, Florynce Kennedy said recently to a small crowd assembled at Convocation Hall.

Kennedy, a black author and outspoken feminist from the United States, was speaking on "The Pathology of Oppression," the last in a series of three lectures organized by the Women's Fund-Raising Coalition. The proceeds of the lectures and other events scheduled for this year, will be used to establish a permanent fund for women's projects.

Fund-raising, as a key issue and coalescing base, is a sophisticated stage of development in the women's movement, Kennedy said. Women have been singularly unsuccessful in effecting social changes, she stated, and they should learn to use their consumer power intelligently to get what they want.

Reading from American media reports, Kennedy named half a dozen companies which spend the largest sums of money on advertising detrimental to women. She urged her audience to take immediate action against such offenders and not waste more time collecting information and doing research. Canadian women should get where the "real money" is, said Kennedy, perhaps even follow the example of a group of feminists who have set up a bank in the United States.

The other major point made by Kennedy in her lecture had to do with the position of women in relation to other minority groups in society. According to Kennedy, "women should be close behind any anti-establishment movement." Feminists should ally themselves more closely with women's socialist groups, she said, and suggested they recruit supporters from other oppressed groups, such as Native people.

"This isn't turbulence. We're hitting trees."

Varsity delegate on the way to Halifax CUP conference.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

Parizeau Perplexed

Back in the old days people were cautioned to tread lightly or risk the ire of the Gods. Nowadays you tread lightly or your local corporations pull out their investment.

Quebec's Finance Minister Jacques Parizeau has in recent months been finding this out for himself. Companies have been pulling their head offices out of Quebec for quite some time now: 236 federally incorporated companies have moved out of Quebec since November 1976. All throughout this "exodus" Parizeau has remained silent.

Now it's the Sun Life Insurance Co.'s turn to go. Adopting the religious metaphor we alluded to at the beginning, president of the Montreal Stock Exchange Dominic Diouhy, said "It's like Black Friday when people like that leave." Bryce Mackasey declared that Quebec is in a "state of shock". Parizeau couldn't take it any longer. He stood up and cried "Not fair!"

Businessmen are unsympathetic. If the PQ government wants to stop companies from leaving Quebec, then the government has to start "catering to head office personnel," said Reginald Groome, President of the Montreal Board of Trade and of Hilton Canada Ltd. He couldn't have been more blunt and, we should add, more precise.

Parizeau should understand this: It's the old business ethic, an ethic Parizeau tacitly endorses. And besides this, he has publicly stated that Sun Life is one of Quebec's worst "exploiters". Why then is he so angry to see the company pull out? Who needs exploiters?

The PQ does, only Parizeau and company need the right kind of exploiters, the kind that can speak French, to be more exact.

The PQ government, like every other government, federal, state or provincial, in North America, is a staunch defender of private enterprise. And like every other government of this sort it needs private investment. This is not at issue. What is at issue is who is going to manage this investment: English-speaking businessmen or French-speaking ones?

The up and coming elements in Quebec society which the PQ represents would rather see themselves taking care of business than their English counterparts. The task facing the PQ has been to make this come about.

The party has tried to achieve this goal in a very direct fashion. It has simply decreed, through Bill 101, that French be the predominant business language.

Well, Anglo-Saxon executives have certainly been leaving Quebec. That part of the PQ's plan worked out quite well. But the executives have also taken with them their jobs. In Parizeau's estimation that is not what they were supposed to do.

That's why he's crying "Unfair!" now.

NOMINATIONS OPEN JANUARY 16th, 1978

Nominations will open January 16th and will remain open until 12:00 noon, January 27th, 1978, for the following positions:

- 4 full-time undergraduate student seats
- 2 part-time undergraduate student seats
- 2 graduate student seats
- 4 teaching staff seats

Vested in the Governing Council are the management and control of the University and of University College, and the property, revenues, business and affairs thereof.

Details of constituencies and electoral procedures will be published shortly in the campus newspapers. Nomination forms will be available upon request on January 16th and thereafter, from the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, or at the Registrars' Offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges. Enquiries may be directed to the Governing Council Secretariat at 978-6576.

Staff meets

The staff meeting on Wednesday at 2:00 pm will hear a report from the Varsity delegates on the CUP conference in Halifax. As well there will be a discussion of plans and ideas for a recruitment campaign near the end of January. Come along and bring a topic.

Editorial Policy

There will be another meeting on Friday to determine the Varsity's position on the Middle East. The conclusions arrived at during the meeting will be used to formulate a staff editorial.

opinions Review Arbitrary

Dr. J. B. Macdonald's review of the Governing Council system will be formally received by that body's executive committee tomorrow, and the recommendations contained therein are to be viewed with alarm by those who believe that students should have a significant role in the governance of this university. The review, which was essentially a response to the Faculty Association's (UTFA) concern over the "diminished role" of faculty in the management of the university, should mollify UTFA, but at the expense of students. After having received numerous briefs and having held hearings, and after having "made a point of seeking out informally the views of a significant number of persons, mostly faculty members," Macdonald has produced a document which, at times, bears more resemblance to an UTFA polemic than to a serious review.

Macdonald's recommendation that the university's academic and resource planning be conducted by a 61-member committee containing 26 faculty members and only 7 students. Macdonald feels that such a committee would "speak with authority and credibility for the whole University community," and justifies the preponderance of faculty by stating that "political balance is not necessary at this level."

The rationale for faculty dominance lies in UTFA's claim that "faculty alone possess detailed knowledge of academic subject matter," by virtue of their "continuing commitment to the University." This rationale is of dubious value. At a time when the scarcity of resources requires difficult decisions concerning the university's future, the faculty, as represented by UTFA, have proven to be more committed to themselves than to the university as a whole. UTFA president Jean Smith displayed that association's "commitment" when he stated that UTFA would be "seeking the maximum" in this year's salary negotiations. Thus UTFA presented a set of demands which has been estimated to represent a 13 per cent increase over this year's salary and benefits package. While the increase would cost the university some $12 million, the Ontario Government's austerity program will limit the increase in this university's funds to $9 million. For the university to meet the impact of inflation in other areas, the faculty salary-benefits increase would have to be less than half the 13 per cent which UTFA is demanding. It would seem that a negotiating position whose acceptance on the part of the university would spell catastrophe for divisions such as the library system is indicative of UTFA's irresponsibility, and it is difficult to contemplate increasing the power of faculty, given the present nature of their association. (It should be noted that some individual faculty have repudiated the UTFA negotiating position.)

A second area of concern in Macdonald's review is his recommendation that the power of the President be increased at the expense of the Governing Council. Macdonald feels that the Council should "act only on the advice of the President," and proposes that "The President (with advice) would judge which (divisional policies) could be implemented without acknowledgement or approval by the Governing Council." The "advice" referred to would be generated by presidential committees which "may be entirely or partly appointed or elected bodies depending on the president's judgement about the need in each case." Macdonald defends this imperial presidency with simplistic comments to the effect that "others carry responsibility for parts of the institution; (the president's) responsibility embraces the whole." Such a position could be extended to political institutions in general, yet most modern political theorists would argue that the advantage of the superior knowledge of an experienced individual is outweighed by the breadth of opinion provided by democratic representation. While an imperial presidency would result in an "orderly and prompt handling of the University's business," it is questionable whether order and promptness are the best criteria with which to judge a system of governance.

In conclusion, it would seem that students are facing an attempt by certain sectors of the university to protect themselves from the impact of resource scarcity, at the expense of the university community as a whole. Macdonald has neglected the fact that, while the transient nature of the student body generates "inexperienced" representation, that transience can also give students an objectivity which has been manifestly lacking in many representatives of other sectors, who are often more concerned with personal career ambitions or with financial security than with the future of the university.

The review's near-total lack of objectivity led one member of the Governing Council to comment that he was glad that the document's 100 pages contained print on one side only, "so that I can use the other side for scrap paper."

Blues Perform Well in Weekend Action

By JEANNE GRAY

The Toronto Invitational Basketball Tournament is one of the most prestigious annual Women's Basketball Tournaments in Southern Ontario. It boasts of a gathering of no less than twelve "A" calibre teams from both Quebec and Ontario, and is held every year in the beginning of January.

This past weekend, Queen's downed McGill for Consolation Championship, while the North Tonawanda Shamrocks took the shelelagh to the University of Ottawa for the 1978 Championship honours. The University of Toronto team failed in their bid to make the final after having won two straight, and then suffering a defeat at the hands of the tenacious U. of Ottawa squad. But before their defeat, they proved themselves twice, with the first of these games against Ottawa Sportshoe.

With a 25-17 lead at half-time, they exploded early in the second half with several unanswered baskets. The combination of Jane Leuty and Barb Grochowski with their patented backdoor play, seemed all that was necessary to stifle the Sportshoe team. Overall the team shot 63 percent from the floor, and 71 percent from the free throw line.

This decisive victory under their belts, they moved on to meet the Toronto Stealers, a city league team with which they were familiar. This proved to be the toughest game that

U of T has played to date, with both teams being very evenly matched in height and speed. Cathy Heather played one of her best defensive games thus far in the campaign by stealing the ball no less than six times. In retrospect, Coach Sharon Bradley said that she was "pleased with the consistency, particularly the team's ability for top play under considerable pressure." Proof of this came in the dying seconds when Sharon Kosmachuk stepped to the line with the score at 59-59. When asked later how she felt in this position, Kosmachuk admitted to thinking, "Please don't anybody tell me now how to sink this shot." Well, they didn't and she did. 61-59 . . . what a triumph!

Sunday, the team met the University of Ottawa, a highly aggressive and speedy squad, who effectively employed a press throughout most of the game. The game was highly physical, with both teams providing a wide open style of offense. The final score was 62-47 against the Ladies. During the first half, U of T failed to connect on numerous occasions from inside the key. Sandy Turney made it look easy from the outside, however, as she accounted for 8 of the team's 24 point tally by half-time. Karen Pim also displayed incredible offensive wizardry as she confidently initiated many of the U of T offensive scoring plays. Joanne Goodrow and Karen Zellen also shone brightly with their 50 percent shooting averages from the floor.

Basketball Blues Prep For Meeting With S.F.

By JIM O'LEARY

The U of T Basketball Blues face their toughest challenge of the season this Tuesday when they meet the renegade Simon Fraser University Clansmen at the Benson Building.

Simon Fraser has become the black sheep among Canadian Universities for their practice of offering scholarships to athletes.

Their recruiting and spending have caused them to be banned from Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) competition. Instead, they compete in the American based National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics (NAIA).

Simon Fraser is coming to Toronto on the tail end of a hectic road trip which has seen them compete in tournaments in Pasadena, California and Nova Scotia. The Clan placed third in the Nova Scotia Invitational, despite arriving from California the day before the tournament began. In their first game, they convincingly beat the number three ranked team in Canada, the St. Mary's Huskies, 87-75.

According to U of T coach John McManus, "If you can go across the country and beat a great team in their own back yard you must be pretty good."

"Pretty good" may be an understatement. The Clansmen boast an awesome squad led by sophomore Tom Skerlak.

Skerlak is a member of Canada's National Team and has been described by National coach Jack Donahue, as "the best pure shooter in Canada." The talented guard entered Simon Fraser with impressive high school credentials he amassed in Welland, Ontario.

Among his records is the Ontario Provincial High School mark of 56 points in one game.

McManus is however, slow to concede victory to the visitors. "When you know your back is against the wall you sometimes play your best," he says.

"Simon Fraser will probably be a little tired by the time they get here, so if we get a couple of breaks we could keep things interesting."

U.S. Takes Can-Am Bowl

By HUGH STUART

Very few observers expected Canada to defeat the United States in the inaugural edition of the Can-Am Bowl held in Tampa, Florida yesterday. Equally few expected that the Canadian defence would not give up a touchdown and that the team would stay within 15 points of their highly rated counterparts. Well that is what happened when Team USA Defeated Team Canada 22-7 on the strength of two interceptions that were returned for touchdowns.

A one yard dive by McGill's Bruce Wilkins accounted for the game's only offensive touchdown.

Unfortunately for the spectators the game was played in a constant downpour. It was thought that this type of weather would aid the Canadians but in fact the reverse was the case.

The Americans were using the smaller American ball that was easier to grip, while the Canadians used the larger Canadian ball. It is no coincidence that when the rain subsided in the fourth quarter and the Canadians switched to the American ball, they scored their touchdown.

In spite of the fact that there was only one offensive touchdown scored, it was a game that featured an incredible American aerial attack that moved the ball at will until it entered the Canadian twenty. Inside the twenty the Canadian defence led by John Preistner was impregnable. Preistner won the Canadian team's MUP for his efforts.

The first quarter found Canada trailing by three. Under the direction of Bowling Green quarterback Mark Miller, the Americans twice drove to inside the Canadian twenty but came away with only one field goal by kicker Bruce Allen (son of NFL coach George Allen).

Acadia's Bob Cameron started at quarterback for Canada but was the victim of two interceptions.

In the second quarter both teams changed quarterbacks. The Americans went with Bruce Threadgill from Mississippi State while Western's Jamie Bone took the helm for Western. The American was the more effective of the two, on one drive moving the ball to the Canadian nine yard line. But in three downs he failed to move the ball over the goal line and the Canadians took possession.

On the American's next two series Threadgill completed passes at will. But again he failed to put a major on the board and the Americans had to settle for two singles.

Things started to happen in the third quarter. After an American field goal, Cameron threw into the arms of Vanderbilt's Bernard Wilson who raced 45 yards for an American touchdown. The convert was good to make the score 15-0.

An interception by McGill's Bill Wendel prevented the Americans from scoring on their next drive. Bone replaced Cameron and from his own goal line threw the slippery ball into the arms of an American linebacker who rambled five yards for a touchdown. After another interception Bone left the game midway through the fourth quarter.

On Canada's next possession Cameron connected with Queen's receiver Bob O'Doherty on two long passes up the middle. He then went to Bob Stracina for ten yards and followed with a fake reverse, running the ball himself to the American one, setting up the only touchdown.

Alberta's Joe Poplawski converted and in spite of a last minute Canadian drive the score remained 22-7.

The Canadians put up a strong fight throughout the game and if it was not for the fact that the defensive line could not put consistent pressure on the American quarterbacks the final score might have been different. A lot of people must be surprised.

according to the coach.

The key to success for the Blues will be shooting. McManus claims that "if we shoot bad we are dead. If we don't hit on the first shot we won't get another chance. Their guys are just too big and will control the backboards."

Despite being underdogs, the Toronto team is looking forward to the game. "For the players it is a challenge to see how good they really are," says McManus.

Cary Farelli Paces Blues In Weekend Series

By JIM O'LEARY

Cary Farelli capped a five goal weekend by scoring with under four minutes left in the game to give the Blues a 5-4 victory over Laval and a sweep of their two weekend exhibition games in Quebec.

The Blues had to withstand a late surge by Laval who swarmed the net in the closing seconds and actually put the puck in the net as the final buzzer sounded. Luckily for the Blues the goal was disallowed despite Laval protests.

The Laval team played a much better game than when these two teams last met. In that game Toronto demolished the visitors 11-1.

Laval checked closely and got good goaltending. Toronto outshot the opposition 43-25.

For the Blues, captain Larry Hopkins picked up two goals, with singles going to Doug Herridge and Jim Snetsinger, before Farelli potted the winner.

On Friday night, Farelli scored four goals to lead the Blues to an impressive 12-2 victory over the University of Moncton Blue Eagles.

The game was no contest for the Blues as they rolled into an early lead and scored at will throughout. Doug Caines netted a pair while singles went to Herridge, Hopkins, Brad Tamblin, Dan D'Alvise, Joe Grant and Frank Davis.

The Blues will now begin preparation for a Friday night home game against the University of Laurentian Voyageurs.

New top dog named

By BLAIR HUNTER

James Milton Ham, Dean of the School of Graduate Studies, has been chosen as the new president of U of T.

A capacity audience comprising the Governing Council executive, members of the U of T community and representatives of the media witnessed Ham's appointment in a special meeting of the Governing Council yesterday afternoon as successor to John Evans, whose term of office expires June 30.

A five-minute closed door session of the Governing Council executive to ratify the decision of the Presidential Search Committee, preceded the announcement by Governing Council Chairperson Marnie Paikin.

In a brief statement Paikin said: "The Governing Council is pleased to announce the appointment of Dean James M. Ham as president of the University of Toronto for a five-year term effective July 1, 1978."

"As a prestigious centre of scholarship the U of T is fortunate to have . . . a noted scholar and knowledgeable leader for president. We will be fortunate to have him to guide us through the difficult years ahead."

Describing Ham as "widely respected and admired for his integrity," Paikin, on behalf of the Governing Council, pledged undivided support for his leadership. Ham, who was given a standing ovation on his entrance to the Council Chamber of Simcoe Hall said, "I am overcome by the complexity of the arrangements and the warm reception."

Ham added: "There is a touch of madness in trying to follow in the footsteps of those who preceded me."

"I am fully committed to this job and I expect the same from all of us (members of the Governing Council) in return, for the sake of the U of T."

Upon adjournment of the meeting Ham held a press conference, adroitly fielding questions from members of the media.

President-elect Ham is a U of T veteran

By BLAIR HUNTER

James Milton Ham will be the 10th president in the 151-year history of the U of T.

Ham, who takes office on July 1, has a career spanning 25 years at this university.

His academic and administrative background includes positions as Dean of the School of Graduate Studies, Dean of the Faculty of (1966-1973), Chairman of the Department of Electrical Engineering (1964-1966), and Chairman of U of T's Research Board (1974-1976).

Ham, who has won numerous professional awards, graduated from the U of T 35 years ago. He then served in the Royal Canadian Navy and later earned a Master and Doctor of Science degrees at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

As chairman of the Ontario Royal Commission on the Health and Safety of Workers in Mines from 1974-1976 he wrote a controversial report calling for legislation to improve working conditions in the province's mines. He has also authored technological publications and textbooks.

At the press conference following his appointment Ham was questioned about the challenges facing the university.

"We must maintain a perspective on the institution itself, and the environment in which it functions. The important problem is the role of the university in the city of Toronto and the commitment to work within the provincial education system," he said.

On the question of a working use of French as a prerequisite for admission to university Ham is adamant.

"I believe a student should have a cultural comprehension, but I do not believe every student should be fluent in French."

On the role of the university in the national unity debate Ham said, "The campus should be a place of analysis and confrontation on the issue of national unity . . . there should be a pipeline between French and English institutions."

Looking to the future: Ham expects "the next five years to be tough, but years of virtue."

Bideep-bideep, that's all folks.

Book budget faces 'butcher'

By JOHN D'ANGELO

Irreparable damage is being done to the U of T book acquisition fund as a result of budget restraints, according to David Esplin, Associate Librarian in Charge of Acquisitions.

In a presentation to the Advisory Committee on the U of T Library System last Thursday, and in a subsequent interview, Esplin pointed out that all possible budget cutbacks, such as the elimination of many duplicate publications, have been performed over the last seven years, and unless a large infusion of some $800,000 is made this year, acquisition fund "butchering" will be inevitable.

Robarts, Fisher, Sigmund Samuel, Science and Medicine, Engineering, Hygiene, Pharmacy, East Asian Studies, and Map libraries are supplied by the fund as well as the university Archives.

The financial problem stems from the base budget of the fund remaining constant at the 1975-1976 level of about $1¼ million, while during the last two years inflation has raised prices an estimated 22 percent for new books, 32 percent for serials, and 17 percent for binding costs. The Library system was successful in securing an additional $300,000 this year, but according to Esplin the devaluation of the Canadian dollar has consumed $200,000, as 97 percent of all acquisitions originate outside the country.

Professor Richard Helmstadter, Chairman of the Advisory Committee, explained that the Library System operates with two key priorities in mind: that at least one copy be bought of each new book with academic relevance to subjects being taught at U of T, and that the current subscriptions to some 30,000 serials (mostly magazines and government publications) be maintained.

Helmstadter also pointed out that originally the extent of serial subscriptions was kept low in foresight of probable huge increases in prices, yet the serial portion of total expenditures has grown from 14 percent in 1968 to 39 percent last year, with an additional estimated increase of 16 percent this year. To further reduce costs, serials will no longer be bound.

New book expenditures have risen from 13 percent to 26 percent of the total fund over the same period, and paperback books will no longer be bound in an attempt to absorb further increases. Since many of the books bought are paperback, notably 90 percent of current European editions, Helmstadter foresees future problems in book maintenance.

Erindale New New Program: yes, no, and filibustered

By KATHY CANTY

The battle over Erindale's controversial "New New Program" isn't over yet.

The first proposal of the program, a resolution that students at the suburban campus be required to complete at least one course from the humanities, the natural sciences and the social sciences, was passed by a narrow majority of 41 to 39 at a meeting of the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences on Monday.

The committee roundly rejected, however, the proposal that Erindale students be compelled to take either two courses in a language other than English or two courses in the field of mathematics.

Debate over the "New New Program" delayed voting on the rest of the recommendations in the plan for another two weeks.

At the beginning of the meeting Students' Administrative Council (SAC) Commissioner Brian O'Riordan attempted to amend a proposal that a committee be formed to examine the structure of the curriculum in the Faculty of Arts and Science at the St. George campus. O'Riordan wants the recommendation to include Erindale College as well.

Desmond Morton, Vice-Principal of Erindale College, however, charged that this was simply a "filibustering" technique used by O'Riordan to delay the voting on the "New New Program." The program has been discussed by university government bodies for approximately a year and a half.

The motion passed was not amended, but O'Riordan was not disappointed by the results of Monday's meeting.

A "substantial portion" of the "New New Program" was defeated, he said. It "shows that there isn't a consensus in the faculty." The speech made by Ralph Wormleighton, Associate Chairman of the Department of Mathematics, sank the proposal concerning language and mathematics requirements, said O'Riordan. (Wormleighton suggested that the Mathematics department could not absorb the increase in the number of Erindale students taking mathematics that would result from this regulation.)

"Morton did not advance any solid academic arguments for the 'New New Program,'" said O'Riordan. "It's crazy at this point to look at Erindale in isolation to the rest of the faculty."

Morton is upset about the way the program is being held up by the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science. It's a "splendid example of a colonial situation," where the "people who carry the responsibility are governed by people who don't," he said. Morton feels that Erindale should have been able to make the decision on its own. "A very strained kind of relationship" has been created, he added.

No-net-cost loses but red light still onCampus Centre in the air, future unsure

By MARK LUKASIEWICZ

The Campus as Campus Centre project remains in limbo following a meeting of the Planning and Resources Committee on December 12. The committee agreed to remove the no-net-cost principle from lounge space in the Campus Centre, but made clear that it would expect further consideration of the Campus as Campus Centre development.

Student governors have been campaigning for more than two years to remove the no-net-cost provision, which halted development of Campus as Campus Centre after its approval in principle by the Governing Council in December, 1974.

SAC president John Tuzyk says that he regards the removal of the no-net-cost restriction from lounge space as a "major victory." (Lounge space constitutes a large portion of the project,) and because it generates no revenue, cannot conform to a "no-net cost" rule.

But the committee's decision does not give the green light to immediate construction of the Campus Centre Phase I. The committee suggested that the Southwest Campus Development Users' Committee decide if and how the Campus Centre bazaar should be included in the Southwest Development plans. The Campus Centre bazaar would house stores, food outlets, a bank, pub, and large student lounge areas and would be built adjacent to Sidney Smith Hall.

The Southwest Campus Development is slated for construction early in the 1980's, at the corner of Huron and Willcocks Streets (present site of the U of T Bookstore). The university administration has consistently urged that the Campus Centre bazaar be scrapped in favor of expanded student facilities in the Southwest Development, which would remain primarily an academic complex.

However, Jack Dimond, Executive Assistant to the Vice-President for Internal Affairs, says that the administration will wait for the Users' Committee report before deciding its position on the Campus Centre bazaar. Dimond said that a decision not to build the bazaar would not necessarily carry implications on other parts of the Campus as Campus Centre plan.

Tuzyk says SAC still believes that the bazaar, proposed for construction on the south side of Sidney Smith Hall, is the best location for the new student services. However, he agrees with the committee that "there is some justification for reviewing the site."

The Planning and Resources Committee suggested that a student representative be appointed to the Southwest Users' Committee. SAC will nominate its vice-president, Dave Jones.

Jones says he will continue to push for the approval and construction of the bazaar, centre piece of Phase I of the Campus Centre. Jones says that the administration would like to abandon the Campus Centre bazaar: "They're desperately trying to. They'd like to spend their money in other ways, and student lounge space looks like the easiest to cut."

At the December 12 Committee meeting, Tuzyk argued that the Sidney Smith bazaar should be built even if student facilities were included in the Southwest Development. But discussion surrounding the motion revealed that several committee members are opposed to the bazaar. One member suggested that architects and planners be engaged to look at alternatives to the bazaar, while Professor Harry Eastman, Vice-President of Research and Planning, suggested that a facility built on a "clear site" might be superior to an addition to Sidney Smith Hall.

If the Southwest Campus Development Committee decides against construction of the Campus Centre bazaar students will have to wait at least 2½ years before any new facilities are ready. But until the Users' Committee makes its decision, the Campus Centre proposal appears to be still firmly attached to the drawing boards.

Parrott inflexible with OFS

By GEORGE COOK

Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott remained firm in his stand on changes to the current student aid program that would see grant eligibility limited to eight periods, according to the Ontario Federation of Student (OFS) chairperson Miriam Edelson.

Members of the OFS executive met with Parrott yesterday morning to discuss proposed changes to the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP).

"Parrott is intransigent on this particular part of the program," Edelson said, in reference to the eligibility periods.

OFS questions the proposed changes to the OSAP plan that will limit a student's grant eligibility to eight periods, enough for four consecutive years of undergraduate post-secondary education.

They claim this will act as a disincentive to students who wish to enter graduate school or professional faculties and whose education takes more than four years.

Edelson said she believed OFS had come to the end of direct negotiations with the ministry over the new student aid proposals. The OFS executive will meet on February 9 with Bill Davis and other members of the cabinet to make its objections known.

Asked if the February 9 meeting could produce changes in the new program Parrott said, "I can't presume to judge what a committee of cabinet will do. I'm firm in my position."

Edelson refused to speculate on the possible outcome of the meeting with Davis.

The details of the new student aid plan were to have been released this month. The ministry has now decided, however, to wait until March before the full extent of the proposed plan is made public.

"Students wanted more consultation, and this meant the release of the new plan would have to be delayed," Parrott said.

Parrott will be meeting U of T students on Thursday at 4 p.m. in the Medical Sciences auditorium to discuss the proposed changes to OSAP.

Sources at OFS expect that Parrott will release details of the "grandfather clause" at Thursday's U of T meeting. This is a clause in the new program to insure that those eligible for OSAP under this year's rules will not be disqualified under the new plan.

Committee shake-up: power to president

By CONNIE FILLETTI

A substantial change in the role of Governing Council, its committee structure and membership on those committees comprises the main proposals discussed in the External Review of Governing Council written by Jack Macdonald, president of the Addition Research Foundation. The report, based on briefs from and hearings with the major U of T constituents, examined "the effectiveness of the Governing Council system in meeting the needs of the University."

The role of the council should become judicial, not managerial, exercising its powers through judicial and monitorial functions, according to Macdonald. He believes this will convert Governing Council from an "active body developing directives to the University to a reactive responsive body assessing the merit, wisdom and feasibility of proposals brought before it."

Macdonald also recommends that the council act only on matters of broad University policy and only on the advice of the President. He claims "the President alone is best positioned to look at each issue from the standpoint of the interests of the entire University and the community it serves."

However, Macdonald stresses that Governing Council should be exposed to solutions alternative to those carrying the President's support and that "it is incumbent on the President to ensure that issues are understood by Governing Council in their entirety."

Devolution of decision-making authority to the divisions of the university is also proposed as part of the council's role in addition to that of judge and monitor.

Macdonald says the effect of this recommendation would be two-fold.

"It will place an onus on the Governing Council to develop appropriate broad guidelines as a framework within which the divisions can work and it will decentralize the responsibility for developing academic policies and managing their own affairs to the divisions themselves."

The council's committee structure also should undergo modification given its new role, Macdonald states.

He calls the present committee structure "cumbersome and slow." Macdonald's recommendation is for three standing committees to replace the five existing ones. External and Internal Affairs would combine to become a Committee on Campus and Community Affairs while Planning and Priorities would merge with Academic Affairs creating a Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning. A Committee on Business Affairs would be the third of the group.

Recommended membership on the proposed committees is "substantially larger" in the report to ensure an authoritative and credible voice for the entire university community, Macdonald claims. He believes also in "the importance of ensuring that the composition of the committee will inspire confidence by having a sufficient number of its members drawn from the academic ranks and from the ranks of principals, deans and directors."

Among Macdonald's specific recommendations concerning membership on standing committees of Governing Council is included that: The number of members of the Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning, exclusive of ex officio members be 61, composed of 7 teaching staff drawn from Governing Council; 7 students drawn from Governing Council; 7 Lieutenant Governors in Council appointees to Governing Council; 7 alumni drawn from Governing Council; 7 administrative staff, 2 drawn from Governing Council and 5 co-opted; 7 Principals, Deans or Directors appointed by the President; and 19 teaching staff, one elected by each division, not otherwise represented by a Governing Council member who is a member of the teaching staff.

Macdonald says that a committee of this nature "would meet the needs of a credible academic voice as well as the perspective achieved through broad representation."

He disavows charges that a 61-member committee would be unwieldy as a legislative body, claiming that the committee as a whole would be dealing with reactions to advice coming from

PARROTT IGNORES VARG ADVICE

We understood you weren't coming Dr. Parrott. Or rather, you first said you were going to come on Dec. 22; then you wrote us a letter saying you were going to take our advice and not come and now you've changed your mind again and decided to brave U of T.

We don't want to sow any illusions. Parrott's visit to U of T does not mean that the proposed student aid plan will be changed drastically. Even if U of T students turn out in great numbers and grill Parrott it is unlikely that he will change his mind. All Parrott has to do is endure the abuse for about an hour and a half and then go home to a quiet evening.

The reason why students should confront Parrott is simply to show their opposition to the government's plan. Students have to turn out on Thursday afternoon and be prepared to tell Parrott what they think of his student aid policy. It won't change anything in the short term but it could form the basis for an increasingly effective student campaign in defense of student interests.

Parrott has a lot to answer for. To start with, there's the issue of who in Ontario gets to go to university. Right now the majority of people who come to university come from an above average income background. We do not know how Parrott's plan will affect this, whether it will restrict the university even more to the rich or whether money will be available to those who would otherwise not afford to come to university. All we know is that this is not Parrott's main concern. Parrott's concern is to stick to a predetermined budget. At the most he's willing to redesign the format of the old program. He is, in other words, looking for ways to take away money from some people and give it to others.

What should a student aid program try to do? Should it be necessary at all to have student aid programs? These fundamental questions Parrott has not even considered let alone come close to answering. All he has had to say about the aims of student aid is that it should fit the budget. Why isn't it the other way round?

Then there's this business about being cut off from student aid after 4 years (8 terms). Why 4 years? Why should graduate school be a luxury? The government says it doesn't want unemployable graduates. What it is proposing means in effect that only graduates with rich parents can be allowed to risk unemployment. From the government's standpoint this makes a sense. A graduate student from a rich family who does not find a job after graduating can be looked after by his family. He or she would not pose a threat to the government. Graduate students who cannot find work but have no family to fall on are more dangerous: they are educated as well as desperate. The solution ought to be socially useful employment for all graduates. Why does the government rule this out of the question?

Parrott would like us to be patient. Details of the program will eventually be released, he assures us. The trouble is that when they are released we will have to live with them whether we like them or not.

There is trouble brewing in other quarters as well. Work on the revised OSAP plan is a month and a half behind schedule, meaning that students may not be able to get their cheques before registration next September. They might even have to wait till January 1979. Why is the government being so irresponsible? Will Parrott tell us next September that it's all our fault, that if he hadn't gone around touring universities the forms would have come out on time?

Somebody has to ask these questions on Thursday and somebody has to hear the answers. Come out and give Dr. Parrott a welcome next Thursday.

It ought to be a welcome he'll never forget.

Correction

Last Wednesday's editorial "A Real Compromise" did not represent the opinion of the Varsity staff but was rather the opinion of one Varsity staffer. A meeting on Friday at 1 p.m. will formulate the Varsity's position on the issue and come up with a staff editorial for Monday.

Gay Youth

One of the loudest protests against homosexuality comes from a sector of the population who appear concerned about the adult homosexual role model and its effect on children. This fear has been voiced most actively by Anita Bryant in her "Save Our Children" campaign.

Recently, Mayor Mel Lastman decided to honour Anita Bryant. At that time he stated: "I do agree that people should live and let live, but I felt strongly that we want these things (homosexuality) out of our schools and universities." (Toronto Star, December 30 1977).

Both Anita Bryant and Mel Lastman are so deeply immersed in the prevalent paranoia surrounding homosexuality, that they totally ignore important segments of their respective populations: gay youth. I am a young, nineteen year old, lesbian. I have followed what I consider to be my natural sexual orientation for nearly two years. I came into contact with lesbians only after having discovered my attraction to women. I had no so-called "perverted" role model to seduce or rape me.

I am young and I am gay, not because of some malicious or traumatic childhood event, but because that is the way I was born.

Many of those in politics who use children and adolescents as pawns in their arguments against homosexuality, are not aware that some of the very people they are trying to protect, are already members of gay organizations such as Gay Youth Toronto, a group for gays under twenty five.

Maintaining the attitude that teenagers in particular need protection reflects the very aegist assumption that young people in high schools are ignorant of sexual matters.

The regular high school system in Toronto reinforces this assumption by deleting any reference whatsoever to lesbianism as a positive and viable lifestyle. Sex education classes are heterosexist education classes. This total lack of solid, factual information cheats the whole student body (straight as well as gay) of the freedom to form their own opinion regarding homosexuality.

I, as one of the gay students, feel particularly wronged. During my formative years, I was not once exposed to a realistic view of lesbianism. It was consistently portrayed as an abnormal deviation somehow connected to mental illness. The fulfillment of one woman loving another was never mentioned. In addition, there are no openly gay teachers; no one with whom I can identify. In a school of over a thousand, I feel incredibly alone.

Even history textbooks remain silent. Although I learn of Virginia Woolfe, Gertrude Stein, Leonardo Da Vinci and Oscar Wilde, I am never told that any or all of them were involved in gay relationships. This type of repressiveness was also present in Nazi society which taught their children to play the music of Heinrich Heine but forgot to add that he was born Jewish.

Assuming that ten per cent of the population is actively homosexual, there is that ten per cent of the students now in schools who feel frustrated and cringe every time teacher makes a remark about "queers". I have not officially come out at the regular school which I still attend because I am afraid that my teachers will lower my marks or fail me altogether due to their own prejudice.

Those who protest loudest against bringing homosexuality into the schools should examine more closely just who it is they are attempting to protect.

We are told by Mr. Illyckyj (One Way Ticket, Jan. 6) to try to use our "imaginings" to discover what other "privileges" there might be in the Soviet Union.

How about free medical and dental care, cheap text books, full employment?

Some emigres living in Canada are terribly concerned about supposed breaches of human rights 'behind the iron curtain'.

Do they ever worry about the rising price of health and education, not to mention rising unemployment? Are these not breaches of our human rights? In view of the fact that Mr. Illyckyj's homeland is Canada, perhaps he might be willing to fight for human rights here as well, or better yet in Chile or South Africa where 10,000s of people have been tortured and killed in recent years.

As a Canadian, I can see many privileges which the Soviet Union offers its people. One does not need to use one's imagination, but merely to look at the facts.

Unreal Solution

Your editorial of Wednesday was astonishing in the thorough and utter lack of insight, lack of understanding of the subject matter, lack of sensitivity and lack of practicality which was exhibited.

You claimed to provide readers with the "Real Solution" to the very complex problems of the Middle East: Give the Palestinian Arabs a state and all will be well, you seemed to suggest.

I am certain, however, that were you to be directly affected by the consequences of your proposed solution you would not be nearly so over-zealous.

You graciously granted in your editorial that Israel might conceivably have reason to fear for its security if a Palestinian Arab state was established alongside Israel west of the Jordan River. Apparently not wanting to seem inconsistent in your one-sidedness, however, you immediately qualified your statement by adding that such fears "would only be justifiable if the PLO represented the government in such a state."

I feel obligated to point out to you the obvious — that neither I nor any supporter of Israel's right to exist, or of freedom in general, will be at all or in any way comforted by your implicit assurance that the PLO will not attempt to come to power — in any way possible — in any future

Palestinian Arab state.

It is, in fact, a foregone conclusion that if such a state came into being the PLO would have no qualms about imposing its rule over the inhabitants. Such a state would then become nothing more than a Soviet-backed launching base for terrorist attacks against Israel.

It should seem no wonder, then, that Israel proposed autonomy for the territories, rather than allowing a fully-independent, radical, new entity to be formed. (Even this far-reaching concession of autonomy is more than any Israeli government has ever before offered.)

It does not seem to me to be exceptionally difficult to understand why Israel further proposed that it keep a close watch on any new autonomous region, or that such a region be federated with some already-existing Middle Eastern state, be it Israel or Jordan, or both.

Israel cannot seriously be expected to entrust her very security to a group of terrorists which is avowed to her destruction, and which has clearly demonstrated its temperament by savagely attacking defenceless and innocent men, women and children throughout the world so many times in the past.

Hopefully this argument will soon be purely academic, with a just and lasting peace prevailing over the Middle East and the world, and the security and rights of all parties dutifully respected.

Until then, however, it will aid the cause of peace for newspaper

Coover defended

Coover is not interested in profiting from the Rosenberg case as Ms. Wigdor in her self-righteous letter charges. But then it is possible she is unaware of this, since she states that she has not read, and has no intention of reading, Coover's courageous and humane novel about the Rosenberg case. Not having read the novel, she is unaware also that it is a careful, detailed, fully documented and researched assault on everybody concerned with the Rosenberg prosecution, and a full vindication of the Rosenbergs, who are the heroes of the novel. Still, if she had read my piece with any care, she would have been aware that neither I nor Coover were sneering at the Rosenbergs or seeking in any sense to profit from their unjust prosecution.

As to the charge that Coover takes advantage of anti-Nixon sentiment but is "not courageous enough to name Eisenhower," again — read the novel, wordsucker! Until you've read the novel and know exactly what Coover said you have no right to make that charge, and in fact the charge is utterly false. Coover talks over and over again in his novel about Eisenhower, as I indicated in my piece. There is in fact a passage in which the pleas of the Rosenbergs to Eisenhower for clemency are set against Eisenhower's refusals, to show the cynical self-righteousness of Eisenhower in the handling of their case.

Furthermore, though you seem to think both Coover and I are unaware, Ms. Wigdor, of the material you quote in your self-pious and flammatory letter, I am aware of all of the material quoted, directly from Coover, since he quotes it extensively in the course of the novel in order to contrast the cynicism and the mob mentality that surrounded the Rosenberg execution with the calm nobility of the Rosenbergs themselves and of their children.

You ask in your letter, "What then is so great about Coover and his so-called 'psychological reality'?" Let me tell you what is so great about it — through it he sets up a howl of outrage at the injustice of the Rosenberg trial that will be heard long after your self-righteous bleatings have died in the feedback of their echoes, and more importantly, he gives significant insights into why it happened, the kind of mentality that produced that monstrous miscarriage of justice and has produced others before and since, of greater and lesser degree. He brings us a little closer to understanding and dealing with the mass psychology that produces the madness of a Rosenberg trial, or a Vishinsky purge, or at its outer extreme, the horrors of the Nazi death camps. He gives us a few clear ideas why these things happen, and why all of us have to eschew the mob mentality if we expect to make a world in which those sorts of horrors will be no longer. It does not surprise me that people such as yourself, whether from the left or the right, who prefer categories to thoughts should be willing to condemn a novel such as Coover's without ever having read it, or spill your spew over my own words in praise of the novel when you haven't read me carefully enough to understand point 1 of what I am saying.

Let me close with this: Ms. Wigdor, if you wish to respond to what I have said, I don't ask you to trouble your complacency to the extent of giving Coover's novel a fair reading before condemning it (since I know perfectly well that in your book condemning without trial is unjustifiable only if done by someone of Eisenhower's political convictions) — but I do ask you this: re-read my review carefully enough, please, to understand what I wrote.

South Africa

It has gotten to the point now where every day I read a letter in an editorial column or hear in a news editorial that the move made by Canada's External Affairs Minister, Donald Jamieson, with regard to South Africa, was inadequate or unjustified unless he intends to isolate us from every Socialist country, Communist country and military junta in the entire world. All these people arguing against the move have missed the point entirely or else simply refuse to acknowledge the true issue: Racism. Not politics, not religious intolerance, not economics.

I agree Jamieson may have had an "eye on the gallery," (Financial Post, Dec. 29, 1977) when he made his announcement about withdrawing Canadian Trade Commissioners, but that doesn't change the fact that it is some small gesture as to where we stand on this issue as a nation. And just maybe if more Canadians showed some support for this move meaningful steps would be taken toward some action on the part of Canada against racist and discriminatory policies of the corporations doing business in South Africa which are not affected by the present withdrawal of support. There are other steps that can and should be taken with regard to South Africa, Chile and other oppressive governments, but let us not cloud this issue; let us at least see it for what it really is: racism as a matter of government policy. If we and other nations do not say no to apartheid even with this small gesture at first, then we're saying yes.

People like W.S. Thomson, (Globe and Mail, Dec. 30, 1977) don't seem to be the least bit interested in what the blacks in South Africa want and need, only that they should in no way be connected to the "Reds". I wonder if this person should not have replaced the word "democracy" in his letter with "capitalism". The fact that the Cuban government has raised the living standard in Cuba from a level of abject poverty for the majority of Cubans to a country whose people are happy and healthy means little to people like this; it means nothing unless it happens through a form of government of which they approve. It is a narrow-minded bigoted political perspective. Have they never heard the phrase "One man's food is another man's poison".

Without the support of the Cubans and other "leftist" governments how far do you believe the Africans would have come in their struggle for autonomy? We hear every day now that our action has only hurt the Blacks in South Africa. How about asking the black South Africans about that instead of some Canadian politician or businessman earning his bread and butter in South Africa. Stop worrying about the "red menace" long enough to note the growing following of Neo-nazis in South Africa.

I am writing to you in response to Jim O'Leary's article in the Jan. 4 issue of the Varg. In it he makes the suggestion that if the smaller Universities cannot compete they should get out and form their own league. This I feel is a gross over-reaction.

Why should the smaller schools have to suffer the further problem of organizing their own league when they have enough problems already with their sports programs? The lack of money, and available talent has already forced one college, R.M.C., to leave the CIAU in Football and join the colleges league. In effect they were forced out by schools such as the U of T and Western who have massive programs, and an extra year of students to pick from.

No, forcing the teams out is not the answer, neither is a union between the strongest teams in protest, what is actually needed is a system much like the one in use down in the States.

The NCAA has a system of divisions, whereby the power-houses such as Michigan and Ohio State play in the first division, and some of the smaller schools such as Bowling Green play in the other divisions. While the NCAA is not perfect by any means, they do have the best system in this respect.

What we especially don't need is for people to over-react, and become blindly patriotic to their schools and their schools' respective programs. We need people to sit down and work out a sensible solution that doesn't entail a mass abandonment of a perfectly seaworthy ship.

This is the second time in as many issues that I have found cause to write to you in regards to the same feature of the Varsity. In the Jan. 6 issue, Jim O'Leary concerns himself in his Side Line By-Line, with the Can-Am Bowl in Tampa. Now, since possible publication of this letter would come after the actual fact in question, I must make some personal assumptions.

Before I do, however, I would like to question a point that is laboured over in the article. Mr. O'Leary uses the phrase, "it seems ironic that it is the Canadians who are moaning about the use of the best talent available . . .", this I find is a very interesting example of not checking out your facts before writing your opinion. The 'Canadians' referred to in the article are obviously meant to be the Canadian Ball-Players. Well, as any avid reader of the Globe and Mail will know, the Canadian team as a whole have not moaned at all, in fact they have welcomed the appearance of their best. Besides, Western Q.B. Jamie Bone is quoted as saying that there is no difference between the calibre of players in Division 1 and Division 2 players.

It seems that the only people who are really doing the moaning are the Canadian newshounds, who are finding invaluable copy in this story. They seem to be revelling in this so-called 'scandal', as it gives them something better to talk about than the size of Tim Allan's shoes.

Moving on, I am in total agreement with Mr. O'Leary's optimistic attitude, and his opinions on the establishment of a running game. I feel with the ability to put the backs in motion, and the total familiarity of our players with this rule, will add an attack that just may confuse the U.S. defenders enough to open up a few holes, especially off-lackie. As for the passing, while our quarterbacks are used to throwing on first down, the U.S. Q.B.'s aren't used to throwing at all. At Bowling Green, the offence is built around the run almost totally, and Mark Jackson is going to find himself in trouble when he is faced with a second and long yardage situation.

Finally, I would like to disagree with the final assessment offered by your paper, and become the only sports writer in the country to predict a win for our side. There are a lot more Bryan Fryer's up here than anybody realizes. Final score of Sunday's game: Canada 27 U.S.A. 24. You heard it right here folks.

Body Politic

The Body Politic, a Gay Liberation Journal published from Toronto, printed an article by Gerald Hannon in its December-January issue called "Men Loving Boys Loving Men".

The Toronto Sun and its columnist Claire Hoy have attacked The Body Politic on December 22, 25 and 27 for publishing the article. The Sun accuses The Body Politic of "encouraging homosexuals to seduce children" and of "recruiting kids while they're young and impressionable".

The Editors of The Body Politic do not encourage and have never encouraged the seduction or molestation of children. We do not counsel and have never counseled anyone to commit a criminal offence. As with any responsible journalism, the article in question attempts to discuss seriously an important social issue with accuracy and understanding.

The Body Politic objects to being vilified for dealing with an issue which other media have refused to discuss in a balanced fashion.

McDonald Report

Both the SAC executive and the editors of the Varsity are concerned with the McDonald Report's recommendation that student representation on Governing Council be confined to seven seats. As a student representative, I cannot help but share their concern.

It appears, however, that in view of the present state of student apathy, these concerns are merely academic (no pun intended). There are, for example, seventeen student vacancies on the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

It would be a rather embarrassing situation if students were granted eleven seats on Governing Council only to have four of them lie vacant for lack of candidates.

PARROTT IS COMING

DR. HARRY PARROTT, MINISTER OF COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES, HAS FINALLY AGREED TO COME TO THE U OF T. HE WILL BE HERE TOMORROW, THURSDAY, JANUARY 12TH AT 4:00 P.M. IN THE MEDICAL SCIENCES AUDITORIUM.

At long last we have our opportunity to influence the direction of the new Student Aid Program. You will want to hear for yourself what the minister has to say about your college career. It is certainly no secret that professional and graduate students will have a keen interest in attending, as they are particularly affected by the four year limit on eligibility on grants.

There is hardly anyone, in fact, who will want to miss what is sure to be a most interesting question and answer period.

Dr. Parrott's appearance comes following five months of repeated and continuous invitations from U of T students. "I'm glad that the minister finally decided to come," SAC President John Tuzyk said. "No doubt a great deal of adverse publicity regarding his rejection of past invitations played a role in his decision."

Whatever the reasons for Dr. Parrott having finally decided to come to the U of T, you won't want to miss hearing him.

ARE WE BEING DELUDED?

Be sure to bring a Ritz cracker with you to Convocation Hall Wednesday, January 18th at 8:00 p.m., when Dr. Wilson Bryan Key, an expert in subliminal seduction in advertising, will explain its secrets. Examine a Ritz cracker beforehand yourself. Look at it closely under a good light to see if you can make out the word SEX written several times. The conscious eye does not perceive this series unless told that it exists, says Dr. Key. The cracker is just one way in which you are being manipulated to buy a product. Dr. Key has investigated thousands of similar cases.

A professor of sociology at the University of Western Ontario for six years, Dr. Key claims that his investigations made him the victim of two years harassment by Western. Advance tickets are $2.50 for SAC fee-paying U of T students. General admission at the door is $3.50.

Dr. Key is the author of two books, Media Sexploitation and Subliminal Seduction. He is the President of Mediaprobe Incorporated. Recently he told a United States Senate subcommittee that only an educated public can hold its own against insidious advertising practices.

What are some of the techniques that utilize the taboos of our society to control our purchasing and voting powers?

- Sex and death "embeds" are present in almost every ad we see — skulls in the ice of a scotch ad, phallic symbols in the clothing of a model.

- The implantation of sexual words on the arms, legs, and clothing of child models utilizes the universal fear of incest to fix a product in our minds.

- The hard-sell approach of deodorant and household cleaners have made bodily odour and dirt reprehensible to us.

Every day we are bombarded with media messages. According to Dr. Key, subliminal seduction is shooting information into our brains without our knowledge — information that will stay in our memories for a lifetime.

Dr. Key is being brought to Toronto by the Students' Administrative Council. Come prepared to be shocked. Be at Convocation Hall Wednesday, January 18th at 8:00 p.m.

VARSITY COMMITTEE SPRING ELECTIONS

As it is now constructed, the Varsity Committee is able to effectively deal with problems related to newspaper management. The newly reorganized committee is responsible for the management, financial policies and editorial integrity of the paper.

Although SAC is the publisher of the Varsity, the paper functions as an independent journalistic voice.

This year the transitionally-composed Varsity Committee is made up of four SAC appointees, four Varsity appointees and a ninth person mutually chosen by both groups. Serving as Chairperson is Heather Hill, Varsity City Editor, and serving as Secretary-Treasurer is Tom Simpson, a member of the SAC Board of Directors from Engineering.

Next year the Varsity Committee will take on its permanent structure. It will be made up of three students from SAC, three members from the Varsity and three people elected by the student body. The election will be held at the same time as other SAC Spring Elections, so if you are interested in serving, keep your eyes open for further details to be posted in February.

Formerly Watson and Reynolds, Mirth has played at a number of clubs in both Toronto and Montreal and most recently the band appeared on television.

Jobless 5 months after graduation

(Non-CUP) — One fifth of the 1976 graduates of the University of Guelph were still looking for something to do 5 months or more after graduation.

Others were in dead end jobs or were in training for positions like teaching which have little future.

Many of those disappointed were women.

"The results for women are frightening," commented Andre Auguer, head of the career planning group which surveyed over 2,000 graduates last year.

A brief report of the results of the survey was released recently to those graduates who responded. A major report is in preparation by the University but has not yet been completed.

The survey had a 76 per cent return. About 500 graduates indicated that they had chosen to continue their education while about 1,000 chose to seek permanent employment.

More than 35 per cent of those who chose to look for work were still looking five months or longer after graduation. The majority of these were female.

About half of those who continued their education went to teachers training "despite warnings of increased unemployment," the report said. About three quarters of these were women. Of those who went to graduate or professional school, well over half were men.

Of those who found work, 18 per cent were in clerical, factory, or construction work. Sixteen per cent of those with jobs were in managerial positions, 15 per cent in natural sciences engineering or mathematics, an equal number in farming, 13 per cent were in teaching or social science related positions, 12 per cent were in sales and 11 per cent in jobs relating to medicine or health, the report said.

Starting salaries ranged broadly, the report said, from about $100 to $275 per week and more. Nearly 40 per cent earned less than $175 weekly.

About twenty five per cent of the respondents who were working were receiving less than $150 per week. This figure was made up of 36 per cent of the employed females and 17 per cent of the employed males. The report indicates that lower salary rates for women may reflect the number employed in clerical work.

Women outnumbered men by more than 2 to 1 in the group employed in clerical work. Men outnumbered women 10 to 1 in farm related employment, 4 to 1 in managerial positions, 3 to 1 in science occupations and 2 to 1 in health related jobs. The latter area includes veterinary graduates.

Ten per cent of males as opposed to 2 per cent of females said that they were self employed, the report noted. It suggested that this reflected the number of men who went into farming.

Despite a higher rate of unemployment, the study says that women looked harder for work than men did, and that men had more offers of work.

The study found that most graduates who found work, found it in Ontario. Most found work in urban centres with populations of more than 30,000. One quarter of those employed found work in Toronto. Nearly as many found work in the Guelph, Kitchener, Cambridge area, the report says.

The report says that most of the graduates were satisfied with the jobs they had. Eighty-two per cent of the respondents said that their employment was career-oriented and 66 per cent that there was an opportunity for promotion.

The study is believed to be the only one of its kind conducted by a Canadian university. The career planning group has been surveying graduates on their post graduate activities since 1973. The return of completed questionnaires has increased from 56 per cent the first year to 76 per cent in 1976.

Not being able to find work was listed as a reason for continuing at school by very few respondents the report said.

Of those who went on to school 9 per cent went to graduate or professional programs, 48 per cent to teacher training and 3 per cent to technical schools.

The 48 per cent in teacher training amounts to about 250 students in a field where experienced teachers are losing their jobs as school enrolments drop.

Students then and now...

Radical Sixties to Cynical

By Gillian O'Reilly

In 1967, U of T students were holding psychedelic festivals, opposing higher SAC fees, demonstrating against American involvement in Vietnam, discovering the sexual revolution, supporting a Campus Centre, denouncing administrative secrecy and demanding better treatment from OSAP. Some of the issues have changed; some have remained, but the attitudes of students seem to have changed. The contrast of the radical Sixties and the apathetic and cynical Seventies is offdrawn. The Varsity talked to several people who were involved in the Sixties to find out what change they see in students' outlook.

"My general impression is that students were very much less sure of what they were doing and why they had come to university," said Dr. John Evans, U of T president. Dr. Evans pointed out that he was

Evans makes the same point: "Nowadays, students tend to be extraordinarily serious about what they get out of university and about the impact of university experience on their chances of employment."

Prof. C. B. Macpherson of the Political Science department contrasted the "questioning rebellious mood of the Sixties" with the "job-oriented mood" of the Seventies, and wondered "which makes them better students?"

In 1967, Macpherson was the chairman of a committee which investigated undergraduate instruction in the faculty of Arts and Sciences. Its report recommended among other things, the abolition of the division between honours and general courses, the placing of less stress on examinations and the reduction of lecture hours. The aim was to do away with the elitism of the honours courses and to foster his professors. Langdon feels that today's students lack confidence: "In the Sixties we thought that here for the first time was a chance to make a difference... Today they don't think they can make a change."

Certainly students in the Sixties had great faith in their ability to change. Langdon commented: "Students hadn't had that force of numbers before and that gave them a feeling that they could accomplish something."

Numbers were an obvious factor since university enrolment had grown enormously throughout the Sixties. As the products of the post-war baby boom reached university age, the institutions had to expand to accommodate them. Many new universities sprang up at this time, including York and Trent. Older ones, like U of T, had to expand. In 1963-64, the whole area west of St. George St. was developed including Sidney Smith Hall, MacLennan

SAC president Spencer and the Varsity editor were arrested in 1972. They were protesting the unequal access policy of Roberts library.

Johnson: "everyone had money & time"

Teaching at MacMaster in 1967 and that he has only impressions of what was happening at U of T. He added, "Students knew what everyone said the university was doing for them but they were not sure themselves."

Jeanne Johnson, an undergraduate at St. Michael's College in 1967 and today, agrees with Evans' views. People came to university, she said, "because it had always been expected. University came after high school the way high school came after grade school."

"Give us Jobs"

Students today tend to have a definite reason for being at university: they want jobs. There is general agreement that today's students are more job-oriented and that the economy is to blame. Johnson observed that students are all "deadly serious about their scholarships, their Canada Council grants and their admissions to law school." Today, "they have to keep their eye on something beyond." She added, "In the Sixties, everyone had money and time."

learning on a more independent basis for the student. "However," Macpherson said, "the students with an active and powerful voice on the Arts and Science faculty insisted on something quite different from what the report recommended." The result was the very open, cafeteria style method of selecting courses. Macpherson noted that "in the past three or four years, various departments have been offering groupings of courses for more specialized programmes partly as a result of demand from a new generation of students."

Students Lack Confidence

Students today seem to be more docile and to want a more structured learning system. They want to learn what the professor says, get the marks and get into the professional faculties. Stephen Langdon, former SAC president, now teaches economics at Carleton University. A recent Globe and Mail article described him as disappointed that his students are less willing to question him than he was to question Physical Building and the Benson Building. The Medical Sciences building was started in the mid-Sixties.

The student movement did provoke a re-examination of many issues. As Langdon remarked in the same Globe and Mail article: "The student movement was part of a process that got people to think more critically." He sees this questioning spirit having been transferred to other groups now, such as tenant organizations, "People aren't afraid to ask tough questions."

A Cultural Revolution

Claude Bissell, U of T president from 1958 to 1972, expressed the same opinion in his memoirs, Halfway Up Parnassus. He commented that "there were solid changes... to some extent springing out of (student) dissent, certainly influenced by it. It was not a quiet revolution but it was an inner revolution."

The student leaders and the university administrators viewed the students of the Sixties as very involved and politically aware. Johnson, however, stated that student activity was actually confined to a small politically organized group of students who had a "burning new cause every year." A larger group, she said, were involved in the cultural revolution which was "in high gear at the time." Magazines were springing up, plays were being written. Most of the campus, however, "couldn't have cared less." She commented that during the October Crisis of 1970, a time most likely to arouse protest, there were "no grand demonstrations." "A little elite tried to stimulate action but most people thought that Trudeau had done the right thing" in invoking the War Measures Act.

The only issue, Johnson said, which did get the students together was the matter of access to the stacks of the new Roberts Library in 1972. "Here was student power in action."

Roberts a Grad Library?

The library question arose when it was announced early in 1972 that undergraduates would not have access to the stacks. Protests arose from the undergraduates, supported by the Graduate Student Union, various college councils and course unions. The climax came when a group varying from 25 to 100 people occupied the Senate Chamber at Simcoe Hall all weekend following a vote by the Senate to keep the policy of unequal access. Metro and campus police were called in by acting president Jack Sward and nineteen demonstrators were arrested including SAC president Bob Spencer, the Varsity editor and a Varsity reporter. After a second demonstration involving two hundred people, a compromise was reached but there were many more discussions and delays before the matter was finally settled.

What provoked the questioning attitude of the Sixties? According to some, the Vietnamese War provided impetus. In Evans' view "the problems in the U.S. were very visible" and "made students restless." He feels that the students then were "more concerned with general social issues."

Langdon takes the view that aware of it, with similar concerns held by the faculty and administration."

Student-Staff Cooperation

An instance in which student and faculty interests converged was in the composition of the Commission on University Government in 1969. The commission resulted in the new University of Toronto Act of 1971 which set up the unicameral governing structure of the Governing Council to replace the old bicameral system. There was controversy over the ratio of students and staff to board and alumni on the investigating commission. The faculty rejected President Bissell's compromise suggestion for balancing the groups and supported the student proposal

Langdon: "thinking critically"

"there was a wider community criticism of the war in Vietnam and the U.S. involvement in Canada."

Bissell commented that although the Vietnamese war had some influence in Canada, it never became the "carrier issue" around which the student movement could gather. He suggests that Canadian students never had a single issue as American students did. The result, he writes, is that student action concentrated around "specific academic issues. The student radical movement at its strongest and best was concerned with the way in which decisions were made within the university and in this concern it coalesced, without being to increase the faculty and students on the commission and grant the board and alumni observer status only.

Prof. Bruce Kidd of the Physical and Health Education department, who graduated in 1964, feels that the student interest in university affairs appeared in the years 1963 and 1964. The questions which interested students in the early Sixties, he said, were more nationally and internationally oriented. U of T had a model Parliament with Liberal, Conservative and New Democratic parties. National unity and nuclear arms were among the issues debated. Kidd picked 1964 as a watershed year and suggested that a possible reason for the change was the expansion of the university at the time. Students began to consider the university's role and to question what was going on in the decision-making bodies.

John Evans had his share of headaches from student protestors: most recently regarding the Stellenbosch visit.

Macpherson pointed out, however, that the reforming groups in Canada and the U.S. were always divided between "those who wanted to change society and those who wanted to change the university."

General Social Issues

U of T did not ignore general social issues. In 1965-8, a committee of U of T staff and students organized that the police saw only a very small part of the student body then and now "we see even less of them than before."

Tom Faulkner, now Tom Sinclair-Faulkner, is a professor of religion at Dalhousie University. In his view the radicalism of the Sixties has had one effect on the students' position in the university. "Students are now treated as adults," he said to the Globe and Mail recently. As a result of the pressure to be included in university government, students are now part of many decision-making bodies, which demand serious commitment. "It's keeping people involved in the day-to-day work of several "teach-ins". These were conferences involving both seminars and mass meetings where many viewpoints were expressed. The first teach-in concerned "Revolution and Response", the second discussed China and the third was titled "Religion and Morality". However, the idea died out after the third one where, it was felt nothing new was learned. The Varsity commented that the speakers preached and said exactly what had been expected of them. It added, "the first teach-in was highly controversial, the second undecided and the third harmless. We see the teach-in degenerating to a grand-scale lecture and we wonder if there will be a fourth."

There is general agreement that students today are asking the "tough questions" from within the system rather than from the outside. "Ten years ago if the situation was bad it was because the system was bad. Now students have found that a new system is not necessarily better so they try to work within for change," commented Evans.

Robert Spencer, former SAC president involved in the library controversy and now a school trustee was quoted in a recent article as saying, "I've found it's better to work within your community and try to do small things before you change the world."

Johnson sees this development as making students more rather than less political. If the economic outlook is bad and "there are only so many places in law school, you eventually want to do something."

The outstanding issue now is the economy and employment. It has been suggested that aside from this one issue there are not so many other problems today which need change. "There are fewer things to be annoyed about today," according to Langdon.

Macpherson, however, offers the opinion that "the underlying issues are not gone but they are not so obvious or so horrifying."

Few Confrontations

For the most part, there were few confrontations between students and administration involving any sort of force or violence. U of T police chief West said, "We've been very fortunate. We've always been able to talk to the students." In Berkeley in 1968, he said, there was one demonstration in which 800 students were arrested. Kent State was the climax of police-student conflict in the States.

There was never the same sort of tension at U of T. West recalled one demonstration where the police were kept to guard the entrance to the President's office. SAC president Tom Faulkner wanted to make sure the police got fed so he had Kentucky Fried Chicken sent in for them. The demonstrators cheerfully passed it up to the police. West pointed out committee meetings) that's tough," Faulkner added.

Johnson commented, "They don't say we're here because we're here and we're going to have a good time. Students are older and a lot more careworn." She suggested another reason for the feeling that students are now treated as adults. "Five to ten years ago there were fewer adults in daytime classes. Now there are grandmothers in some of my courses. You have to treat these people as adults."

Miss U of T 1967

In many ways students today seem more mature than their counterparts of 1967. In spite of the supposed political consciousness of the Sixties, the pages of the Varsity offer a different view. In the fall of 1967, for instance, there are many stories on the Miss U of T contest, complete with pictures of the contestants and the eventual winner.

There is a double page of the outfits (modelled by a Varsity reporter) which Miss U of T might purchase from Holt Renfrew as a part of her prize. Pictures of "slavegirl" auctions and headlines such as "Engineers Sacrifice Virgin" seem juvenile to us today. Johnson pointed out that the revolution also depended on where one was. "When I came to St. Mike's in 1967, it was an Irish-American country club. It still is," she added, "It's sort of the land that time forgot."

Other issues have become irrelevant now. The Varsity no longer publishes two-page articles on taking the Pill. A 1967 article asked five girls about the "morality" of taking the Pill. (None of those asked felt that taking the Pill was immoral, although one girl expressed the opinion that it was far more moral than engaging in "unnatural sex" to prevent pregnancy.)

To sum up the attitudes of Sixties students is difficult. Many of the perceptions are governed by the position of the speaker; SAC presidents are likely to be far more conscious of the political events than the average undergraduate who may represent the views of many of the students. As Bruce Kidd noted, "every generation of students is a very heterogeneous group" and classifying them under one viewpoint can only be at best a sweeping generalization.

The mood of the Sixties was probably one of broader questioning. It was energetic but diffused over many issues. It was supported by great faith in the value of change. Students did not look to the future because the economic situation did not demand it. They could immerse themselves in social, cultural or university issues. The same confidence and disregard for the future could also foster the "country club" attitude of those who chose not to get involved. By contrast, students today have to be more serious and more future-oriented. A certain cynicism prevents them from having the energy and hope of their predecessors in the Sixties. However, as Johnson commented, this can be seen as a more political atmosphere. All students are aware of the basic issue: the economy, because it affects all of them. Students who do get involved in political or social causes realize that the process will be slow and demanding.

However, the best comment on the question of students was expressed by Doonesbury in November 1977: "Whether or not students have really changed remains to be seen. But one thing is very, very clear: life goes on."

Smith: "You would think it was the army!"

Campus cop suspended over hair length regulation

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

A U of T campus policeman was suspended without pay on January 6 for not getting a haircut when his supervisor told him to do so.

Bob Smith, employed by the U of T for the past year, says he has the feeling he'll remain suspended until he meets the new regulations. "But I'm not going to cut my hair to those specifications," he said. "You would think it was the army!"

A meeting was to take place on Monday between Smith and chief of Campus Police J.B. West to negotiate the suspension. West, however, phoned in sick on that day. Consequently Smith went one more day without pay, until another meeting could be arranged.

Smith described his hair as "maybe one-quarter inch below the collar." Regulations as of two months ago permit hair to be not longer than one inch above the collar, "tapered toward the neck." New regulations also allow a moustache and sideburns, which cannot be "lower than the lower auditory of the ear."

"They are a pretty amazing bunch of regulations, and I don't think I should lose pay over them," says Smith. He added that Chief West supposedly reprimanded several other officers for having long hair, but that he was the only one suspended.

Smith explained that his union (United Plant Guard Workers of America) proposed to submit a policy grievance regarding the new guidelines of hair length. "We were going to have a vote about it, but never got around to it."

West said "nothing is being done at the moment with respect to Smith. There will be an inter-departmental hearing on this, and possible disciplinary action may be taken."

West went on to say management and the union will decide when the hearings should take place. When asked whether Smith would continue to lose pay until this meeting took place, West replied: "Of course he's suspended without pay, pending any hearings."

Yesterday West agreed to meet with Smith to discuss the suspension. He informed Smith that he would be suspended without pay until January 16, regardless of the length of his hair. He also said that he would only be able to keep his job after that date if he cut his hair.

"I'm not cutting my hair," concluded Smith, "so I guess my services will be terminated on the 16th. I'll be fired, so I'll turn my case over to my union."

subcommittees. Each subcommittee would comprise 20 members according to Macdonald.

Macdonald denies also that seven student members on the committee constitutes "token representation." He believes the subcommittees will be representative enough to put across the point of view of any particular estate. He says he is not concerned with disenfranchising any division in his restructuring proposals.

The Students' Administrative Council (SAC), however, proposed other additions to the membership of Governing Council which would increase the total size of the council from 50 to 66.

UTSA, in their brief, requested that "its constituency's seats be doubled to four in order that each representative would be on no more than one major committee, thereby making their work load more manageable."

The Librarians Association of the University of Toronto asked that librarians be recognized as a separate electoral constituency and be entitled to a seat on Governing Council.

Macdonald responded that "none of the proposals for changing the composition of the Governing Council is persuasive if the earlier recommendations which would very significantly lighten work loads are accepted."

And referring to SAC University Government Commissioner Brian O'Riordan's claim that he may be rejecting a 1974 Governing Council proposal whereby students would have 11 members to the 13 memberships allowed the teaching staff, Macdonald said he is not rejecting any specific number arrangement.

"No arrangement is going to be any more acceptable than the present number as no estate will ever be satisfied. I see no substantive problem and it would be extremely damaging to the university to reopen debate in this area in terms of time and energy."

John Evans, president of U of T, stated that in a large university like U of T it is difficult to give a sense of involvement to each division of the university without having them involved in that body. He believes the disadvantages of having a large number on the committee would have to be weighed against the advantages of having each division represented in the deliberations.

Evans admits a 61-member committee is too large to debate but he claims it will be a receiver committee for the work of subcommittees.

Macdonald maintains that his proposals on the role of Governing Council allow for power concerning broad University policy to stay with the council despite the emphasis on the office of the President.

"There is a deliberate shift of responsibility to the President on issues that are not broad University policy but that may be important to particular divisions; therefore, they should be able to clear those up. The president is not making the decision," Macdonald said.

Evans commented that the External Review tries to reduce the involvement of Governing Council in smaller matters in order to reserve their time for major policy decisions.

He said Macdonald's report will be "controversial" in different sections of the University and that the solutions it proposes should be debated and discussed. Evans describes the review as "excellent in quality" and as being "very informative and penetrating in its analysis."

In order to meet these price increases, the portions of the fund to suffer the most have included the buying of duplicate volumes (which means fewer books outside Roberts for undergraduate use), and the acquisition of old or special collection publications.

In the past, with the introduction of new courses or the expansion of departments, the library has tried to supplement their stock of corresponding library material. Last year, for example, according to Phil Ryan, Students' Administrative Council (SAC) representative on the committee, the university imported an extensive number of texts from India. However such enhancement purchases will not be possible in the future.

The U of T library collection ranks among the top 10 in North America, with close to four million volumes, and in the words of Professor Frank Watt, member of the committee, "other Canadian universities look to this university to have a complete collection." This is evidenced by a Council of Ontario Universities study, as yet unreleased, showing that 82 percent of the U of T Library collection is not duplicated in any other library in Ontario or Quebec.

The cutbacks are now likely to force a restructure of the ordering system, Watt said. The university policy has always been to include no preferences when buying material for the 62 fields of study offered at the university, so that cutbacks should ideally affect all students equally.

Unfortunately, according to Helmstadter, it is often very difficult to know beforehand which new books are the best. The lead time for reviews is often two or three years.

Esplin is particularly concerned that current deficiencies in acquisitions will never be recovered in future years. He spoke of the missing editions in the library of periodicals and books published in the great depression of the thirties. Many periodical subscriptions were not re-established until the fifties, and numerous books of that time cannot be bought today; thus, permanent gaps remain in the collection. Similarly, many books that aren't bought soon after publication today simply won't be available in the future.

Down to earth at Vic

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

9:30 a.m. "Time for a coffee break," says Victoria College groundsman Peter Hooiveld, with a charming Dutch accent. In the basement of the fieldhouse situated on Charles St., surrounded by old parts of machinery, the men eagerly throw off their jackets. Hooiveld fills a kettle from a rusty tap.

He has worked on the Victoria College grounds for 2 years, having come to Canada from Holland in 1951.

"Thank God we're out of that crazy hippie system," says Hooiveld shaking his head. "A few years ago the kids used to go around tramping through the mud with their dirty hair, expecting to get jobs." Hooiveld explains that the dress and attitudes of students on campus have most definitely improved since the sixties. "Now their hair is shorter and they are more serious than in that 'flower child' time." Hooiveld has four children of his own.

Although he is on the college grounds until 4 o'clock every afternoon, Hooiveld says it is not too often that he comes into contact with students. "Only the odd kind of student will approach us," he explains. "I am not the type to approach them first."

"Most of the time the kids are very friendly to us, but sometimes we meet a few sour ones." When the groundsmen flood the Victoria College ice rink, in the late evening, they are often hassled by uncooperative students. "But we clean it for their benefit."

The groundsmen remember the time a resident of Margaret Addison wanted to skate, while a group of students were playing hockey. "This little wee short thing yelled at about 10 of 'em to get off that ice with their pucks — fast! In a few minutes, she had the whole rink to herself."

Hooiveld smiles and says he enjoys his job. He leans back in his creaky old chair, and tells of his last trip to Holland. He explains why he would not like to live there anymore.

"My heart is where my home is, and my home is Canada."

In this column, The Varsity will be examining from time to time the people who make up the U of T community. Varsity reporters will be interviewing various students, staff and faculty members, service workers and anyone else who has a place in this institution.

Black Friday brings bad luck

Friday the 13th is the day — the last day of dropping out of school. After that there's a miserable blot on your record — a mark of eternal shame.

And now, in rooms, dining halls, cafeterias, libraries and washrooms all over campus students are casting back to those halcyon days before Christmas when essays were young and they thought tomorrow would never come.

Yet no one can escape the harsh reality of the present. The essays remain undone, the courses remain unattended, the professors remain.

There's only one way out. Black Friday. But the shame of it! The humiliation when your mother and aunt Flo, who had so much faith in your brilliant, original, if slightly undisciplined mind, discover that you, their last best hope, have dropped out of school.

And what, you wonder, as panic grips you and you begin to consider the ramifications of half a BA — what will become of you?

It could mean a life of relative poverty and ignorance, devoid of light, love and holidays in Florida.

But wait! Do not despair. Tomorrow is another day. Who knows, you may find a lucky penny and all will be well. Or you may trip over a black cat and fall headlong into the hall mirror. In which case . . .

Sking Squad Slip Slidin' Away

By GLYNIS PETERS

In their first week-end of racing after a strenuous winter training camp, the cross-country ski team fell victim to the weather and the vagaries of a good wax job.

Results for the Joselin Cup, held on Saturday are not yet available. It is the results of the Muskoka Loppet, held on Sunday during the rain, that will follow, and as previously stated, with so much depending on waxing an accurate assessment of team standings cannot be given.

The race was open to anyone, but allowed for a University division in point tally. Out of 103 competitors; Veli Niinimaa led the Toronto team by placing 22nd. Andre LaPlante close behind even with a late start, came 24th and Paul Stapleton was on his heels in 27th spot. Nine men competed for U of T, and as a team, came 4th, only 12 minutes total time behind the winners, Guelph. The race was won by 1976 Olympian, Reijo Puiras, a Finlander now living in Thunder Bay.

The team of four women did extremely well, coming 2nd to Western by only a couple of minutes. Considering that several of Toronto's best women skiers did not compete this augers well for the team in the future. Individually, Stefa Katamay came 9th out of 27 competitors, with Taru Paakkonen and Mary Pearson coming in that order a few minutes behind her.

Coach Veli Niinimaa regarded this competition as training for the team and considering the weather was satisfied with the results. This week-end the team is hosting the Toronto Invitational in Midland. Let's hope the weather improves!

Foul Play!

By GLYNIS PETERS

What is a Baskethon? Well, it is a fund-raising project in which the participants enlist sponsors to pay them for shooting foul shots. Lucrative employment? Not exactly... the money goes to help support basketball, not only at the U of T, but also nationally and provincially.

Anyone is eligible to take part and pledge cards are available in Room 102 at the Benson Building. The idea is to make as many foul shots as you can out of 100 attempts. What does the shooter get for this amazing endurance test? Prizes! Yes, prizes are available for both good shooting and the amount of money raised. On top of this, everyone who collects $25.00 receives a Baskethon Pin or Crest.

Why don't YOU take up the challenge and support the University of Toronto Basketball program? If you hesitate to step to the foul line yourself, find a basketball team member and sponsor them! To pick your team member come to the game tonight at the Benson Building at 7:30, when the Lady Blues take on Waterloo. See you there!

The Women's Interfaculty Ice Hockey season is well under way, with most of the teams having completed half of their regular season games. Tight battles for playoff positions are found in almost every division, especially in Rec III where SMC A is on top with six points, with Pharmacy and Vic following closely behind. In Rec II, Law II and FEUT boast undefeated campaigns. Rehab II is following closely behind the leaders with 6 points in 3 outings to date. In Rec I, New College leads the pack with 8 points while SMC B and Forestry follow with 7 each.

Two teams from each Recreation Division will make the playoffs, and as of yet, none of the positions have been determined.

In the Competitive League, PHE I leads with 9, while Erindale lurks in the shadows with 6 and a game at hand. PHE II and Scarborough are still in contention however, and so the month of January should provide some good exciting hockey.

The 1977-78 Women's Interfaculty Ice Hockey standings are posted in the Benson Building opposite the Matron's office, and again here for perusal at your leisure.

If we were an ordinary store, we'd sell Pioneer, Marantz, Yamaha, Sansui, etc. Instead, we've evolved into such lines as HARMAN, KARDON, LUXMAN and DENON. The result: the finest equipment available on the market.

If you're seriously interested in a sound system you don't have to go to every corner of Toronto. Within the university community is a store that offers top service, free technical advice and most important, great prices. Come down (or up) and see me in the Colonnade (131 Bloor St.). Side Line By-Line

Man, I got so proud and patriotic after the strong Canadian performance in the Can-Am Bowl last weekend that I even changed channels on Sunday night from The National News to the news on a Buffalo station. My purpose? To see Canada's performance lauded by the Americans.

What did I see? A fifteen second report that was given about as much emphasis as Fergie Oliver would give to the Ontario Lawn Bowling Championships. It made me ask myself whether Canadians should really be patting themselves so hard on the back as a result of Canada's 22-7 loss. It sure looks as if it was just another one of many bowl games for the Americans.

It's pretty heady stuff when someone such as Wilfrid Laurier lineman John Miller, predicts that in a couple of years Canada could beat the Americans. It's a pleasant thought but I fear it is totally unrealistic.

Undoubtedly Canada did very well, but I think that the worst thing that could happen to Canadian college football would be for Canada to threaten the American security in the belief that their collegians are the best in the world. Say for example that Canada won the Can-Am Bowl. What would happen? In all likelihood the first thing would be that the Americans would set aside a date for next year's Can-Am Bowl on which all of its best players would be available (this year with a few exceptions the elite was missing due to other bowl commitments). Secondly they would probably decide to spend more than the one week that they spent this year in preparing for the game. Finally with four downs and a smaller field, using eleven players instead of twelve and permit blitzing. And what would the result of these changes be? In all likelihood the awoken giant would walk all over the Canadians. And even if that isn't a legitimate prediction, it is one that must be taken into consideration.

An American slaughter of Team Canada could have dire consequences, and could set Canadian college football back many years. It would prove once and for all to the fans and critics (particularly those who support the reduction of sports budgets) that the Canadian college game is inferior to the Americans and not one to be taken seriously. Furthermore the professional Canadian Football League would no longer have to make excuses for not using Canadian collegians in key positions. All they would have to do is point to the superiority of the American college players as proven in the Can-Am Bowl.

Compared to the United States we have a small population to draw upon for football talent. The game is taken so seriously by the American colleges that they provide scholarships for the very best players. American college teams have eight or nine assistant coaches. Canadian teams have three or four. Americans have a longer season. Canada in spite of factors such as these can beat the Americans in hockey; but Canadians practically grow up on skates. The dream of the majority of young Canadians is to play for the Leafs or the Canadiens and not the Argos (God forbid) or the Als. So hockey's our game and football is the Americans', and all the machinery that is necessary to make the country the best in the world in their respective sports is made available. In spite of these obstacles Canada performed very respectably in the Can-Am Bowl, but being as good as the Americans must not become the be all and end all of Canadian college football. We must be satisfied with the quality of our own, unique game.

There are three ways that the Can-Am Bowl can go. The first is that it can go the way of Canadian American hockey confrontations (Do you get excited anymore when Canada beats the Americans in hockey?) with reporters' comments such as "The Americans showed great hustle and enthusiasm but simply lacked the talent to stop the Canadians when they turned it on." Reverse the countries and that could be the game report of many a Can-Am Bowl to come.

The second way is that a Canadian college team could seriously threaten the Americans one year, causing them to get serious about the game. The consequences of that have already been explained.

The third possibility is that Canada consistently beats or comes close to beating the Americans. This is a possibility, but probably not in the near future. It took the Russians and the Czechs a long time and many one sided games before they learned enough to defeat the Canadians in hockey. Canada may have to suffer some lopsided defeats in football before they're a serious threat to the Americans. Unfortunately we live on a continent which has impatient fans and an impatient press and it is quite possible that before the time comes that Canada can consistently beat the Americans, the American-Canadian confrontation may lose its appeal.

Last weekend the Canadian team proved to the Americans, and more importantly to the Canadian fans, that Canadian college football is played at a very high level. But let's not let this go to our head and throw caution to the wind. It would be better to satisfy our patriotic urges every few years than commit ourselves to play once a year. Why? Because realistically we have nothing left to prove and a lot to lose.

Learn A Sport In Spare Time

By JIM O'LEARY

Have you ever had the experience of stepping up to the first tee with your Jack Nicklaus autographed clubs, your patent leather golf shoes and your imported golf glove only to shank the ball or hook it out of bounds? Your embarrassment becomes even more acute when your 14-year-old brother steps up with his mix-and-match set of clubs he got at Collegiate Sports and with his bare hands and three-year-old pair of Adidas cracks the ball 250 yards down the middle of the fairway.

This experience is no worse than losing in tennis to your younger sister, getting flipped karate style by the kid next store, stepping all over the feet of your dance partner or sinking to the bottom after swimming half-way across the family pool.

You can take heart in knowing that these embarrassing moments need not happen again. Under the direction of the Department of Athletics and Recreation, an instruction program in a variety of sports and activities is being offered in the Benson Building and Hart House.

The program is to cover ten weeks from January 16 to the end of March and is open to all fee-paying members of the university as well as faculty and staff. The amazing part of all this is that the programs are offered absolutely free of charge.

To take 10 weeks of private golf lessons would cost you in the neighbourhood of $100, while lessons in tennis, judo, figure skating and dance would set you back similar amounts.

Almost all of the U of T instructors are full time staff members who meet rigid qualifications in their instruction area. Other instructors, such as those for dance are specialists in their fields and teach in other studios around Toronto.

In all, over 20 activities are offered covering a wide range of interests. A quick glance shows a variety of swimming programs ranging from beginners to life guard certification to diving and synchronized swimming. Dance has become a popular activity and types of dance include ballet, contemporary, folk, jazz and ballroom. The always popular sports program is made up of archery, badminton, fencing, figure skating, golf, gymnastics, judo, karate, tennis and yoga.

According to Instruction Co-ordinator Anne Hewett, the objective of the instruction program is to give members of the university community an opportunity to acquire and improve skills and provide a means of relaxation in an enjoyable atmosphere. All programs are progressive which allows you to participate at a level commensurate with your talent. Hewett also stresses that there are no team sports and the program is formulated to introduce people to lifetime activities they can do on their own.

All the programs are co-ed and Hewett is pleased to say that there is support in most programs from both sexes, including dance programs like ballet and jazz. It seems the dance programs are popular among many of the members of the men's intercollegiate teams who can improve their balance and flexibility by the dance exercises.

As a final note Hewett announces that all equipment is supplied free of charge (with the exception on a $2.00 fee for tennis balls) so even if you try a sport and decide it's not for you, it will cost you nothing. The program is based on the assumption that money and equipment should not be a deterrent to participation. All the participant has to bring is himself.

Registration for all the programs will take place in the Benson Building lounge this Wednesday and Thursday. Why not drop by and sign up to learn and avoid those embarrassing moments on the golf course, tennis court, on the dance floor and in the pool.

Trinity In Lead For T. A. Reed

The T.A. Reed standings recently released by the Intramural office show Trinity College comfortably ahead in Division One and Dentistry leading in Division II. The T.A. Reed Trophy is awarded annually to the college or faculty that accumulates the most points in the intramural sports schedule.

The standings to date have been compiled by using all sports which have been completed to date. Points are awarded on the basis of participation and results. A college with high participation in the intramural program will receive points regardless of their won lost record. The college which combines high participation with athletic excellence stands the best chance of winning the T.A. Reed trophy.

Parrott under fire over OSAP plan

By KATHY CANTY

Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, appeared before a capacity audience of U of T students at the Medical Sciences Auditorium yesterday.

After a two-hour question and answer period John Tuzyk, president of the Students' Administrative Council (SAC), summed up the meeting by stating that many questions about the new Ontario Study Grant Plan (OSGP) still remain to be answered.

Leo Casey, Vice-President of the Graduate Student's Union, (GSU) asked Parrott why graduate and professional students will be denied assistance under the new program. "Graduate schools and professional schools have become the haunts of the affluent," he declared. The crowd responded with explosive applause.

"You will be given a great deal more help in your undergraduate years," Parrott replied vaguely, as someone from the audience shouted "Answer what he said."

John Bonner, Student Aid Planner for the Ontario government, then attempted to broach the question. The "grandfather clause" in the new program will alleviate some of the problems of graduate students, he suggested. Under this clause a student who would have been eligible for grant assistance under the old student aid program can take out a loan in 1978 and have the principal of that loan paid by the Ontario government later in the year. The "grandfather clause," however will only be in operation for one year.

Neither Parrott nor Bonner would say how much students and parents would be expected to contribute towards the cost of an individual's education. "What percentage of summer earnings and parental contribution will be required will not be known until March and then we'll put that program through," said Bonner.

Stephen Overbury, an undergraduate student at University College, however, brought forward some surprising facts on this matter. Overbury had phoned Ronalds Federated Graphics, the company which will be printing the student aid brochures for 1978. Art Daughton, a sales man for the company, told him that the layout for these brochures was already prepared. Overbury said he was told by Daughton that the company would have a final draft of the brochure "with all the details" ready in 10 days.

A red-faced Parrott replied that "probably a good deal of work was done on the brochures," but all the "details are not finalized." The ministry is "very concerned about the public relations of this new program," he added.

Overbury, however, was not the only student to bring forward relevant information. Agnes Kruchio, a reporter for the York University student newspaper Excalibur, said that the Ontario government has underspent its student aid budget by $35 million dollars over the past six years. She wanted to know how much the government would underspend on the new program.

Parrott said, "We have this year a method whereby we can come within a few dollars" of the budget. "We feel we can be right on target."

Another student asked why a student must spend three years in the work force to be qualified as an independent student.

Bonner said the three-year rule was established because the planners "couldn't think of a reason for having it in, but we couldn't think of a reason for not having it in." At this point the crowd responded with boos and hisses.

"Let me tell you a fish story": Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities explains the new OSAP program to discontented students yesterday. "You will be given a great deal more help in your undergraduate years," he said.

Solid "no" to apartheid

By ALAN STEWART

The U of T should have no official policy on its relations with the institutions of other nations, the External Affairs Committee of Governing Council decided on Wednesday. The same resolution condemned apartheid and undertook to "discourage members of the university community from taking any initiative which might be construed as approving such policies."

The committee took up what alumna representative Joyce Forster called "that naughty question we're hoping to avoid." The resolution, moved by Innis College principal William Saywell and seconded by administrative staff representative James Kraemer, passed 5-1. Full-time undergraduate representative Peter Neilson voted against the motion.

Grad student representative Chris Rogers spoke first to the question, asking the committee to make a "clear and unequivocal statement" against racist institutions.

Saywell then introduced his motion, designed to take into consideration the need to protect intellectual freedom and the positive influence that members of the university community could have on officials from foreign nations.

Saywell argued that representatives from countries that ignore the UN Declaration on Human Rights should be told "Yes you may come... but I want you to know how the university feels." Committee chairman John Cowan added that communication and dialogue should always be possible because "the failure to communicate is an even worse threat than racism."

Neilson, however, charged that the resolution was internally self-contradictory and took no new positive stand of any kind.

Graduate Students' Union (GSU) president Leo Casey delivered the only written and oral briefs on the issue. He argued that receiving officials from racist institutions amounted to an official condonation of racism. Casey told The Varsity he was pleased that the committee had made the first official condemnation of racism by an official university body.

"Given the make-up of Governing Council, it is certainly the most positive action we could expect. It's still only words, but at least it's on record."

Presidential assistant Jack Sword said the committee's condemnation might influence decisions by university administrators who are asked to receive officials from racist institutions: "There might not be anybody around on the day they want to come."

The passage of Saywell's resolution has effectively defused Rogers' report on the university's relations with South Africa, which was not ready for Wednesday's meeting and will be presented at the next meeting on February 8.

With this new resolution, the committee will confine itself to issues not under the existing rubric. The first of these will be the university's policy of investing in companies which do business in South Africa. According to Saywell "We'll never finish with South Africa until the South African blacks finish it for us."

By JIM O'LEARY

Women have been barred from competing in a number of recreational sports by the latest decision of the Department of Athletics. In a meeting at the Benson Building Wednesday night, the Athletic Council passed a motion limiting co-ed athletic participation to non-contact sports.

The sports affected are soccer, lacrosse, football, hockey, boxing, wrestling, rugby, field hockey and basketball.

The motion was presented by Recreation Co-ordinator Dave Copp who sought to overturn an October decision which permitted two women to compete in the men's intramural soccer league. At that time Sheila Lewis and Barbara MacKay were allowed to finish the season for the University College team after their case received widespread coverage in the Toronto media.

While admitting that there is no "considerable evidence" to indicate women are more susceptible to injury when competing with men, the injury factor was an important determinant in the decision.

"The easy thing for us (the Athletic Council) to do is tell the women to go and play," says Copp. He felt that such an action would be negligent, however, due to the fact that evidence indicates that women may suffer more joint and knee-cap injuries in open competition.

Director of Athletics, A. J. "Bud" Fraser, feared the university could be held liable if a woman sustained a serious injury in open competition. Both the U of T's legal advisers and the Ombudsman concurred with this assessment.

Robin Campbell expressed concern that if men and women played in the same leagues the level of competition would drop. "We have to be concerned not only with injuries but have to look also at ability." He feared that if competition is open, not only will women play in the men's leagues but men could invade the women's league and dominate play.

It was also argued at the meeting that if women compete with men on an equal basis, the nature of the games would be altered due to the reluctance of many males to play with the same aggressiveness against a woman.

Some members of council seemed to think the whole issue was somewhat overblown claiming that very few women would be interested in open competition. They argued that women are happy to play in their own leagues.

Council member Bruce Kidd felt the real issue in question was whether or not "we are going to accept the sex stereotyping which goes on in sport." He argued that females are just as competitive as males and called on anyone to "show me the gene that says competition."

According to Kidd the injury and liability arguments are false excuses. He claims that injuries will be reduced by proper fitness and that liability is the problem of the university's insurance company.

The council also passed a motion allowing for open competition in all sports where co-ed participation is not explicitly forbidden. Also recommended was that "a research project be undertaken at the earliest opportunity to investigate medical, legal and other components of open competition."

Graffiti on walls cost university money

By TOM KUHN

Over $20,000 in wanton damage to university buildings, including graffiti and poster removal, was spent over a 30-month period by U of T, according to a report submitted to U of T president John Evans by the Physical Plant department.

The report, compiled by Walter Terry, Assistant Manager of Physical Plant for Building, Fabric and Grounds division, cited the steady and increased damage to the "fabric" of the university in the past five years.

The $20,000 figure is actually low. It does not include some trades work done by the university itself, Terry said. The $20,000 involved $10,261 for damage repairs, $5,292 for removing graffiti and $4,446 for poster removal.

The costs also cover painting to hide graffiti, removal by sandblasting, replacing the name plates at Simcoe Hall and University College, and replacing stolen drapes and stolen fire extinguishers among many other items.

"Monday at about 8.30 p.m. the latest incident of vandalism occurred. At University College the side partitions to the urinal in the men's washroom in Croft Chapter House were torn off the wall breaking several wall tiles," Terry said.

Terry called for a general campaign by students themselves to prevent that kind of damage.

"It seems vandalism is a growing problem," said Students' Administrative Council (SAC) president John Tuzyk.

SAC will decide in a meeting next week whether to start a promotional and advertising campaign.

"We've done two or three things in our own advertising to limit the number of posters we put up. Instead of putting out two or three posters a week, we use one weekly poster instead," Tuzyk said.

Essay-writing made easy at Robarts clinic

By STEPHANIE ORTENZI

Robarts Library has been called many things but never before a department store.

The analogy was drawn by library consultant Carolyn Murray. She compared rushed essay-writers to rushed shoppers who stay on the first floor and then complain of the inadequacies of the store.

For this problem Robarts offers paper and essay clinics on January 20, 21 and 28. Library instructors explain how to use the library in the first hour, and two writing-lab instructors show how to organize an essay for specific areas of study.

Murray said that the instructors "are diagnosing ills. There is no way we can cure anyone." She hopes students will see the areas in which they need more instruction.

Last fall the program had a turnout of 3,000 from all areas of study, and 250 in the essay clinic alone. Murray, however, says she is not satisfied with the 10 per cent turnout. She believes it should be 50 per cent because "half of the population doesn't know what the library has to offer."

Library workers at Robarts offer help for special problems because "there are a lot of peculiar topics," said Murray. She added that New College offers a half-course credit in Information Skills (NEW 250F).

A committee called the Workshop

For Campus Librarians Interested in Library Instruction is trying to draw the college libraries together in the effort to give library instruction. As a result the clinics change from term to term because colleges share and exchange their orientation programs.

Kathy Dickson, a third-year History student who took the program this fall, said it was "excellent in essay organization but more could have been done on note-taking procedures" for research material.

Barry Adams, a first-year History student, said the program helped a great deal. "The university library is a real horror especially when you're in a rush."

Noreen Kuroyama, a returning student at Woodsworth, found the clinic helpful "for the small things I hadn't known before, like using dictionaries and encyclopaedias."

Artists should defend themselves in market

By RANDY WINTER

Beginning artists play the role of the "inept neurotic" and "love being shat upon," according to commercial artist and entrepreneur Charles Pachter.

Pachter, speaking on Wednesday in the first of the Hart House Art Committee's series of seminars on the art market, said that "artists have to learn to demand payment for services rendered."

He explained that people are brought up believing that an artist must starve for years to earn the respect of society. Young artists must ignore those myths, he stated, and learn to fend for themselves in the art market.

To this end, Pachter formed the Canadian Artists Representation (CAR), a professional union to protect the rights of artists. Among other things, CAR shows artists how to keep books, claim expenses at tax time, and bill for services rendered.

Pachter said that beginning artists should understand themselves and how their work relates to public tastes. They should recognize that a small elite buys visual art in this country and that a serious artist can't compete with Farrah Fawcett-Majors posters for the masses.

Pachter's hope to change the taste of the masses with a series of inexpensive graphics resulted in "a slap in the face," he said. The fact that copies of Picassos are finding their way out to Scarborough indicates a shift in taste, Pachter said, but it may not keep pace with the current proliferation of popular culture art pieces. According to Pachter, this proliferation, coupled with the scarcity of art criticism, means little or no feedback for starting artists.

Pachter still feels that artists should attempt to promote themselves, despite their being attacked for doing so. He himself issued a catalogue of his graphics and placed advertisements in magazines, and was accused of "heresy" in both cases.

Pachter advocated taking advantage of trends and public interest. When he learned of the popularity of his "Moosamour," which depicts a moose in a field, he announced a forthcoming series of moose pictures, the first to be called "Basic Moose" and the last "to be signed by the artist in front of the buyer at the buyer's convenience." Pachter left his tongue in cheek long enough to tell artists to "spread the rumour that you're dying."

Star Trek's kids' stuff

By CAROLYN CLINK

The perennial appeal of Star Trek lies in its appeal to the adolescent in all of us, American professor Richard Simon said.

Speaking at University College on Tuesday in the second of three talks on popular culture, the visiting lecturer explained that the television show's presentation of adolescent problems "always promises rosy answers."

"Sociologically and psychologically Captain Kirk, Doctor Spock, and 'Bones' McCoy are in a position of adolescence." Kirk's role is to balance McCoy's emotionalism and Spock's coolness, Simon explained. He sees the combination of their personalities as an illustration of learning to be an adult.

Kirk is constantly caught in identity crises, Simon said. He is split into two, "good and bad," or "real and unreal," but is reassured when the crew is able to divine which is "the real McCoy."

Simon also explained that the worlds the starship Enterprise visit are "neither strange or new." The social structures of the planets are similar to that of the Enterprise. Men are "Boy Scouts in outer space," and women are either "waitresses or monsters," always waiting to tempt "the boys to play house."

Traditionally, an alien encountering American culture is either converted to "American culture" or destroyed, Simon stated. But the Viet Nam war forced a shift in the United States from "let me help" to non-interference. Star Trek's turn from traditional American views to its own cultural message of "anti-war and anti-imperialism" could have been responsible for the show's cancellation, Simon hinted.

"Facts aren't coming through" --quiet concern over OSAP

By GEORGE COOK

In comparison with his earlier visit to Seneca College last October the reception given Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and universities, at U of T yesterday was decidedly quiet.

"I just want to know what's going on. I'm worried because it doesn't seem that the facts are coming through," music student Mary Haines said before the meeting.

Despite the quieter atmosphere, however, student concerns were voiced and Parrott was questioned on a wide range of subjects.

Comments made after the meeting were generally pessimistic.

"There are a lot of questions that haven't been answered. It was mostly public relations," Robyn Macpherson, a part-time student from Woodsworth College, said.

Nor was Bruce Wood, National Union of Student's Ontario field worker, impressed. "It was a dead-end. I came here specifically hoping for some elaboration of the grandfather clause, and Parrott just jumped around it."

Specific objections from students centred on independent status. "I don't think I should be a burden to my parents. The government should do something," science student Salim Rahemtulla commented.

"It's so late in the year and we know so little. It's impossible to plan for next year," another student added.

James Ham, the next president of the U of T, said he came to the meeting "to listen and to learn. It was helpful to me to listen to the kind of questions students are asking."

"When at last a section of our countrymen rose in arms to claim rights long denied them, rights which were immediately acknowledged to be just — as soon as they were asked with bullets — are we to have sympathy for them?"
Sir Wilfrid Laurier

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

NOW WHAT HARRY?

"Our future is at stake," said the SAC poster advertising yesterday's visit to U of T by Harry Parrott. If the meeting is anything to go by we don't have much of a future left to stake.

Parrott, of course, said all the things we expected him to say. He told us that the new student aid program will have to fit the budget and he spent a lot of time on technical questions. In the end we knew little more than we knew before Parrott graced us with his presence.

The meeting was really nothing more than a public relations manoeuvre to try to convince students that the government is willing to listen to them. The parameters of the new program, however, were determined a long time ago. As Parrott himself said there are 76 million dollars allotted for student aid and no more. The only decision left to be made, if indeed it is left to be made, is how that 76 million dollars is going to be distributed. What Parrott wants from the students is advice on how to take money from some people and give it to others. Parrott simply wants students to do his dirty work for him. When the new plan comes out and the poorer students start complaining that they were ripped off he wants to be able to say that it was their fellow students who ripped them off.

Why must student aid not cost more than $76 million?

Parrott has given no reason for this other than that we are living in a period of "constraint". Where the constraints have come from or why we have to put up with them are questions that remain unanswered.

And they will remain unanswered. This period of constraint that we are supposed to be living in is in reality a period of economic crisis. We are going through one more of a regular series of crises that capitalism cannot help but generate. The government, Parrott's government as well as Trudeau's, is committed to protecting the very system that causes these crises which in practice means defending profits at the expense of those least able to pay. That's what's meant by constraint: the poor paying for the sins of the rich.

Parrott cannot explain why we have constraints because to do so would mean exposing himself and his government as brokers for the moneybags.

But as we said we didn't expect better from Parrott.

We did, however, expect better from the organizers. We did not expect, for example, that the chairman would take it upon himself to limit the question period. If people had questions they should have been heard. Or if Parrott didn't want to answer them he should have been allowed to say so himself. And there was more time. Parrott stayed behind at least half an hour after the meeting had ended.

One came away with the impression that OFS did not want anybody to contest its monopolization of the correct position. While OFS was allowed to make a lengthy statement at the beginning of the meeting other student militants were harassed and even cut off by the chair. It would seem that OFS views itself as the brains and only needs students for muscle.

OFS however is another story altogether. We'll get to it another day.

The Parrott meeting could have been a beginning, not that the meeting could have changed anything. But it could certainly have heated up things a bit at U of T. Instead we were treated to a sparring match between a government bureaucrat and several student bureaucrats.

letters & opinions

Welcome Parrott

Tomorrow afternoon, Dr. Parrott is coming to the university. Instead of "enduring abuse", he might be more appreciative of rational and informed discussion. In future time, when students again have an opportunity for input, he (or his successor) would probably be in a more receptive frame of mind.

Dr. Parrott is coming to explain his position and to defend it. This position was arrived at after probably a fair amount of thought and consideration for the parties involved. As well as students, there are also the taxpayers of Ontario who are also feeling the crunch of inflation. Unemployed graduates do pose an economic burden and to continue to produce them is not being responsible.

If the revision of the OSAP scheme is to be finished, then decisions must be made at some time. So that those considering OSAP next year might have reliable information to base their decisions on, I hope that the time has come.

If, as you say, the majority of students in university now (under the present OSAP system) are from above average income families, then revisions should be made. Funds are limited, so somebody will have to manage with a reduced loan or grant or perhaps without it.

Student aims are not a good thing to base budget construction on. In the first place, they are frequently poorly defined or not defined at all. Those students who have a firm idea of what they plan to do while at university usually have alternative funding in mind if their OSAP cheque should be cancelled. In the second place, student aims are rarely earned. Supported by parents until reaching university, they have not contributed to society to the extent that they deserve subsidized education. Even if the subsidization comes in the form of a loan, it is not an expensive loan by marketplace standards.

Good financial management necessitates a budget. A budget, in practice, defines the limit of funds available. Thus student aims will have to fit the budget as the converse is not justifiable.

Without government financial assistance, it is not true that university education is limited to the rich. I am sure that many of us are children of people who worked their way through school, a course or a year at a time, in the years before OSAP.

You also called for socially useful employment for all graduates. What will be the source of this employment? This is another topic entirely and not the responsibility of Dr. Parrott.

This is a letter of protest against your editorial. While editorials are understood to represent the editor's viewpoint, if no protest is made you might feel that your expressed opinion is that of all U of T students. It is not.

Macdonald report

With regard to Mr. Donald Guloien's recent letter on the Macdonald Report on the Governing Council (Varsity, January 11), I would like to offer the following comments. Mr. Guloien's letter contained several factual errors relating both to the composition of the Governing Council and the General Committee of Arts and Science. I will, however, deal with his basic premise. He argued that because of what he calls the "present state of Student apathy", SAC should be careful in asking for increased student representation on Governing Council because there are several unfilled student seats on the General Committee of Arts and Science, and it would be embarrassing if student seats on the Governing Council also went unfilled. First of all, the Governing Council after an 18 month review recommended an increase of 3 student seats on the Council raising the student membership to 11 from its present 8. Neither of the suburban colleges or the smaller professional faculties are currently given specific representation. This was one of the reasons that Council was eventually persuaded to forward to the provincial government the recommendation for greater student representation on Council. The Macdonald Report recommends that the Governing Council abandon the recommendations of its 1974 review and allow for teaching-staff representation on a 61-member super-committee such that they would have 33 seats, while letting the overall composition of the Council remain as is at 50.

There have been very few students acclaimed rather than elected to Governing Council over the years. The Governing Council is a visible and effective governing body and students have perceived that they can occasionally affect policies generated and approved there. The same cannot often be generally said of the General Committee of Arts and Science, which has demonstrated itself over and over again to be a less than effective body where students have only some 49 out of 199 seats. Students have not perceived this body to be an effective or credible one, and the student vacancies to a large extent can be explained by this factor. Nevertheless, there should not be vacancies on the General Committee. Mr. Guloien's comparison of the General Committee of Arts and Science with the Governing Council is an invidious one. I am heartened to see that he shares our concern about the Macdonald Report's blatant attempt to diminish the role of students within the top governing structure of the U of T. Attempts in the past by the General Committee of Arts and Science to limit the role of students in the governance of the Faculty have led to student indifference and hostility towards the General Committee. One can only hope that the Governing Council will reject most of the recommendations of the Macdonald Report and so avoid transforming itself into a General Committee of Arts and Science.

Rod Stewart: a footloose and fancy free fruit who comes in live delicious flavours. Just ask Britt. Here he shows off his new inconspicuous hearing aid. See p. 6 for review of his and E.L.P.'s new album.

Sheridan's play The Critic hits TO. Personally we're sick of shows that make fun of transvestites. A new rendition of the original snuff comedy. See p. 8.

Factory Lab's play Beyond Mozambique features a cast of degenerates, Nazis, mad scientists, porn queens, homosexual priests, and dismembered bodies. Bring the kids. Lots of nukes for the little ones. See p. 9 for gruesome details.

Fassbinder's latest opus Effi Briest: satisfies, but at a snail's pace.

Effi Briest is the Victorian heroine of our dreams. No one falls in love with Emma Bovary, that narrow-minded little sorority girl with all those Flaubertian fingernails scattered through her hair. Dumas' women seem to have been exhumed from Madame Tussaud's. Agnes Wickfield has the erotic fascination of the girl down the street who founded the Abstainers' Day Care Centre and cheerleads for Athletes in Action. Maybe Anna Karenina, but who needs the outpourings of Russian angst...

No. In the end we're left with Effi, the naturkind, the girl in the white muslin dress on the swing looking like Ellen Terry without the glaze of tuberculosis. Married to the austere older man who once courted her mother, carted off to some provincial town two days from cosmopolitan Cuxhaven where the wind blows in from the Arctic and the local gentry consider the Prussians lax and lascivious, left alone in the November nights with no one but a gothic ice princess and the ghost of a suicide Chinese for company, at eighteen she's been married a year and is pregnant. Neglected, impressionable, passionate — what more could anyone of us wish?

Not much. When the suave and slimy Major Crampas begins to pay his attentions the impulse is to cheer, and not for him. Fontane's novel was, however, written in and about Bismarck's Germany where the Voice of Society howled like Woden's hounds for the blood of any transgressor of the accepted rules. Therefore Effi must be found out, after a long period of regret and remorse, not so much for her action as for the fact that she did not love the man with whom she committed her sin. She is discovered. Her ex-lover is killed in a duel by her husband. Effi is exiled. Her daughter is reared to revile her mother. Even her parents dispute before they decide to provide a home for her in illness. In the end she recalls, almost, her curse upon her husband, and dies. A Victorian ending to an immoral tale.

The novel is a major work in the history of German fiction, and one of importance on any international scale. It is, however, not quite the novel we'd have imagined to have sprung instantly to the mind of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, the aesthete of contemporary boredom, the Godard of the '70s, the man who slap-dashes out seven or eight films in a calendar year, the present darling of those who need a name to invoke against the evil spirits of Hollywood and popularity.

Nonetheless Effi Briest is Fassbinder's latest film to hit Toronto. It has been hailed as his best yet by those critics in New York who are allowed to say such things (in spite of the fact that it is doubtful whether or not anyone except Fassbinder and two or three people in Berlin have seen all his work). Poor Brian, on the other hand, who suffers not so much from humility as from an aversion to the director at hand, can't make such statements. Effi is certainly closer to the mainstream of 'classic' motion pictures than Fassbinder's work usually is. Filmed with obvious care and time, photographed in black and white, subtly acted, and paced with the slow majestic precision which featured Alain Resnais' early works, the film has the surface lustre of teak furniture hand-polished the innocent of Lemon Pledge. Fassbinder constantly slows his action (of which there's damn little to start with) by employing stills, white-out white-ins, dissolves and a curious narrative trick of having the action narrated while the actors stand before us either frozen or going through the motions of some other inconsequential activity. When, for example, Effi encounters her daughter after the forced separation, she is shown walking slowly up a museum staircase while the narrator tells of her panicked jump from a tram.

The focus is constantly on the multiple surfaces of each scene. Characters are invariably seen reflected in mirrors, through voile curtains or veils. In dialogues one speaker is held in focus while the other is a blur in foreground or background. Then, almost arbitrarily their positions will shift. Fassbinder also employs titles in the manner of the silent cinema. These are often moral captions (which explain little) or leaves from Effi's confessions (which serve as transitions, bridges of action between one set-piece and the next).

All of which has the grandeur and austerity of the society which is the director's subject. Each scene is a frieze to be read in the manner of a narrative painting. (Comparisons with Barry Lyndon raise their ugly heads and may be dispatched with one stroke. Fassbinder's tableaux have much more to tell us than have Kubrick's.)

But what is it that we are to understand from all of this? It's impressive, sure. It'll be a ticket to the filmic Parnassus for Fassbinder who, up to this point, has been treated as Godard was, as a maker of inspired but unfinished fragments. The simplest answer is that Effi Briest is a faithful transcription of Fontane's novel, and that the novelist's indictment of his society is rendered faithfully.

Which is not sufficient. The director has stripped the text. The novel's acute sense of place is softened. The secondary characters have been narrated out of existence. The social satire of provincial life in Kessin has disappeared. Instettin, Effi's husband with his iron spine and his devotion to the cult of honour, has been moved to share the centre with his wife. He mouths pieties about control, discipline and honour which might have been rendered ridiculous but Fassbinder has declined that option. Instettin's code is not specious. His morality is that which, for better or worse, managed to forge the German nation state out of a mass of squabbling principalities. Effi is the innocent strangled, and our sympathies are with her. Crampas, her lover, with his daring 'decadence' is not a worthy object for her attentions. He cannot counterweight the force of Instettin's regulated being. The outcome of their duel is never in doubt.

In Fassbinder's film we are presented with the opposition between the will and the affections, between Effi and Instettin. The ideal outcome is not difficult to deduce but this cannot be the case. Crampas with his surface charm intervenes; he is the easy way out. He is the challenge to Instettin's way which hardens it into an inflexible armour from which there is no escape. At the risk of turning Fassbinder into Walter Scott the intervention of Crampas marks the beginning of the end for the essentially valuable elements in Instettin's 'honourable' way of life, and, by inference, Germany's honour. Without him and the challenge he represents Instettin and Effi might have moderated one another, might have achieved a synthesis. The entry of the third term destroys the balance.

An exercise in phenomenological elegy perhaps? Whatever else it may be Effi Briest is an extremely long, beautifully constructed film (and the temptation to expatiate on the glories of watching Hanna Schygulla as Effi is difficult to resist). It's well worth the ticket but I'd recommend two cups of espresso first.

Looking at the front cover of the new Emerson, Lake and Palmer album, Works Volume Two, one can easily be misled as to the tone of the music found therein. The cover as well as the title adequately represent all of the progressive rock pretension for which this band is justly famous. However the charge of misleading advertising should be laid, because the music is basically light pop.

Like the previous l.p., Works Volume One, there are solo tracks by each of the members, as well as group efforts. But whereas on the earlier album, Emerson composed a fully orchestrated piano concerto, he attempts nothing so grandiose here. Instead, his solo efforts consist of various rags including some Scott Joplin and Meade Lux Lewis, utilizing brass backing. The interpretations are quite admirable, and as a result, these pieces are the highlights of the album.

Mr. Lake however comes off very badly because he attempts to pass off vacuous lyrics and trite melodies as deep and significant art. Pete Dinklage, late of similar debauchery with King Crimson and other unfortunate bands, is largely responsible for the lyrics. And with Greg singing in his patented echo chamber, the results are as shallow as "C'est La Vie".

Carl Palmer provides evidence that he is an excellent percussionist, a case ironically never in doubt. However no substantive evidence is provided in favour of his music writing talent, a case largely undefendable. On "Bullfrog" we have progressive calypso, and "Close But Not Touching" gives us the equivalent of the big brass sounds of the Ohio State Marching Band.

Palmer's sorry composing skills are shared by the entire band on this l.p. However, what they continue to demonstrate is their immense playing talents. This dichotomy is well illustrated by the tracks they work on as a band. The material is extremely weak even though they all contribute to the writing and arranging. But they simultaneously demonstrate that they are one of the highest, most accomplished rock bands around. However, sadly, this is not sufficient.

Footloose....

Footloose And Fancy Free is Rod Stewart's third album since the Faces disbanded and already it is sitting pretty in the number three spot on the Billboard album chart. Like his last effort A Night On The Town, on the cover of Footloose Stewart assumes his persona of the libertine. The image is in keeping with the album's content, songs about lost loves, songs about lovers, and songs about kicking ass on a Saturday night. All in all, it's typical Stewart fare but don't let that deceive you, this is a nifty album.

Stewart has assembled a group of excellent musicians for this recording and so production-wise, it is a very smooth product. Yet unlike Atlantic Crossing, the overall sound here is not blown out of proportion and for once the strings add to the album. Rod has gone from one extreme, namely the crude backing of a bar band, to the other, Mussel Shoals' musicians and a cast of thousands. Maybe this disc marks a happy medium for the tousle-haired rocker.

Footloose And Fancy Free opens with "Hot Legs" and "Born Loose", two rockers that are no different than any others that Stewart has ever done, although the three guitars provide a nice backing. As ever it is the slow songs that highlight this album. Stewart's voice is best suited for torch songs and his tortured gravelly vocals are always fun for the whole family.

"You're In My Heart" is the single, of course, and it is vintage Stewart. Another love song, it demonstrates why he is such a popular artist. Quite simply, all of us fall in love at some point and all of us go through hell because of it at others. Stewart has a song for each situation and the listener sympathizes with every single one. There's something for everyone here.

So what can I say? If you like Rod Stewart, you probably already own this disc. If you don't like him, buy it anyway. Then buy some firewood, matches, and a fireplace. Invite a loved one and a good bottle of wine. If you still don't like it, buy the game Twister and a bottle of Mazola.

Nervous? Try reviewing The Critic!

I'm sure the cast of Sheridan's The Critic, will enjoy the following comparison with the Royal Shakespeare Company's touring production of Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer currently sleeping at the O'Keefe Centre. Goldsmith's play is a wittier, more economical, better constructed comedy than Sheridan's sloppy sketch. And the cast of the one is composed of seasoned professionals, while the other is comprised of a motley crew of English and Drama professors and students. But where She Stoops has been boring thousands, the production at the small Studio Theatre will probably entertain many.

Of course, the cavern called the O'Keefe Centre makes fine wit as useful as a copy of Penthouse to a eunuch. But it is still not sufficient excuse for Clifford Williams' direction of the tortuously ponderous exchange of lines that substitutes for quick verbal parry and thrusts in the She Stoops production. An audience that has time to analyze a line before responding to it will seldom find anything to laugh at. Herbert Whittaker's production of The Critic (first presented fifty years later than Goldsmith's play in 1799), however, admittedly playing in a more intimate and useful space, still presents Sheridan's comedy with a certain feel for the pace needed to bring the play to life.

Sheridan's The Critic is based on contemporary theatrical references, the most subtle of which are lost to ordinary audiences today. Puffery, critics, author-directors, stage conventions, pompous actors and British society are still, however, perfect comic material particularly for university audiences. Critics still sneer and we are all too well aware in Toronto that our newspapers still prefer to have publicity-hype artists rather than trained theatre, dance and film critics for writers. Actors still strut. Playwrights are notoriously over-sensitive. And the theatre is still not free of upper-class "coo-ers" getting involved in the arts and other charities. So with a little blustering energy, a sense that Oscar Wilde brought drawing rooms of the past into our living rooms, and an acceptance that the tragedy in the second part of the play should be played as farce, Herbert Whittaker and his cast make Sheridan's play into a sophisticated college revue — precisely how it works best.

Because it is a play for actors, it is all the more important that a few good actors be given a free-rein. Leigha Lee Browne established the surprisingly professional tone of a number of performances with her perfectly charming presentation of Robertson Davies' prologue and the character of Mrs. Dangle. Michael Tait was perfect as Sir Fretful Plagiary — an insecure pop who is more bellows than forger of plays. And James Mainprize surely had second-rate playwrights fuming with his literary posturing as Sneer (But oh how he put them in their place!) The major role in the play was taken by Bruce Wall as Mr. Puff; the witty extortionist turned playwright who should have remained what must at the time have been the fore-runner of an ad-man rather than tackle tragedies and an acting company. Although being a friend of Bruce's meant it was sometimes hard to tell where Bruce left off and Mr. Puff began, he nevertheless demonstrated significant talent as an interpreter of young comic characters. His energy and flamboyance helped unite the two parts of the play.

Just to show that this is not a 'puffoblige' for the drama centre, I would like to suggest that the cast entertain no thoughts of transferring the play to Drury Lane, the Aldwych theatre or Factory Lab's stage. Mistakes are made in theatre by assuming something is more than it is. The Critic does quite nicely on the Studio's stage.

Williams stoops to commercialism

"On the night when Oliver Goldsmith's satiric sentimental comedy, She Stoops to Conquer, was first performed," it is recorded, "its author nervously walked the streets. He dared peep into the playhouse only at the unfortunate moment when the one and only hiss was heard — whereupon he fled and was not to know until later that he had achieved a tremendous success."

If Oliver Goldsmith had been around for last Wednesday afternoon's matinee of his comedy inside the cavernous auditorium of the O'Keefe Centre, he could have seen a mass of disgruntled patrons. Throughout, people left the theatre. They left for good reason. This gentle comedy which was given such brilliant treatment by Michael Bawtree a few years ago at Stratford was maimed by poor direction and ineffectual acting.

Enough said. What needs to be emphasized, something I have stated before and will no doubt state again, is that commercial managements, (and, yes, that includes Triumph Productions whose presentation She Stoops to Conquer is, and from whom, we trust, we shall be receiving no more goodies of similar quality), must be made responsible for their actions.

If we let them continue to run in with theatrical trash, bankrupt of any semblance of quality, then we deserve it when they run out with the profit. Yet, why we should allow such abuse by a management like Triumph which is capable of producing such fine work as Jonathan Miller's Three Sisters, with Janet Suzman, is quite beyond me. We must change this practice. We, the audiences, must ensure a transformation. Our voice at the box office is the strongest.

Clifford Williams, an associate director of the subsidized Royal Shakespeare Theatre and one of Britain's most commercial directors (with five shows running in the West End) is the director of She Stoops to Conquer. He is no stranger to Toronto. His luck here, however, has rarely been good. He was the director of the ill-fated project known as Theatre Toronto. "I had not researched the subject of coming to Canada very deeply" he told Judith Cook in a previous interview. "They're (Canadians) well known for welcoming you with open arms and then shoving the dagger in the left shoulder blade. We did some good work but it was a bad experience." When I asked him to comment more specifically on this statement he replied hesitantly: "It was a very long time ago, you know... I think there was a great deal of suspicion about me which some actors had, and which led to an inability for me to become friendly with them. You can't work in the theatre unless there is a great deal of friendship. There was a great deal of whispering behind one's back going on." Throughout this reply there was one of those well-let's-get-on-with-it expressions on his face.

Another subject which came rapidly to my mind was the all male production of As You Like It which Williams had originally directed very successfully for the National Theatre of Great Britain and later mounted for a touring production throughout North America. This touring version played the O'Keefe Centre to much critical and popular disappointment. Why? "That production", Williams insisted, "which toured for six months was as good as the original London production when it first started at ACT in San Francisco. However, when I caught up with it in Boston before it went to Broadway there was no saving it. The performance had become a shouting match because the actors had to play in those large North American theatres."

When I was watching Williams' production of She Stoops to Conquer at the O'Keefe, his earlier answer went through my mind. Was the extravagant mugging and exaggerated point-making merely because of the unsuitability of the theatre? Somehow, I think that is a very poor excuse.

Beyond Mozambique: All this and Rita Hayworth

If you are looking for sun and excitement try Mozambique. Beyond Mozambique at Factory Theatre Lab. Life in this crazy land is not a holiday, for here we are subject to strange happenings and exposed to bizarre characters. The operative codes in this world are body-snatching, adultery, drug addiction and murder. The grotesque is commonplace to some, a daily routine, for others, it is well off the beaten path. Rebellion and insurrection at every turn. This steaming mass of tangled green destroys life. And people are paying to see it.

Only George Walker could give birth to such a world and somehow make it funny. As a playwright Mr. Walker has a talent for compressed crisp action. In his jungle, off-beat forces are destroying six characters. Some pass without pain and some do not (a hand here, a foot there). It is safe to say that everyone is dead in the end. Good stuff for the box office. All this and Rita Hayworth too.

It is difficult to say where the Beyond is, but anywhere is good enough. Dr. Rocco is in command and his dubious experiments occupy much of his time. Stabilizing forces of law and religion are useless here; those who enforce and preach are unstable themselves. The characters move through life clutching at their own selfish concerns: Rita is a porn queen with jungle visions of stardom, and the doctor's crazed wife believes she is Olga from Chekhov's Three Sisters. Despite the varied fantasies everyone is destined to collide with fate.

It is hopeless, but we still keep laughing. The action and characters (with every gesture) appear so distorted that it is impossible not to laugh. It is difficult to say who is enjoying the play more, the audience or the actors. The cast seems to be caught in the absurd nature of the play, ignorant of its tragic element. In this respect the director is at fault.

George Walker as director of this production gives us hollow character portrayals in both gesture and speech. No vital connection exists between actor and character. David Bolt's character Dr. Rocco is inexcusable. One would expect Bolt's familiarity with Walker's plays would have carried him in new directions, but his performance was all too familiar and in some ways predictable.

The only character that allowed for some subtle depth was Olga. Though Olga's dreams and fantasies remove her from the jungle she is the only character to place it in proper perspective. Barbara Gordan was refreshing in this role, a welcome contrast to the other performers.

Mr. Walker's style as a playwright is really our concern here. He has generated a good deal of attention as of late and Factory Lab is almost banking on it. As a director, he is not as competent. There is always hope.

Someone remarked, "the set even smells like a jungle." It might be worthwhile finding out; perhaps your jungle is Beyond Mozambique.

Nothing is stirring in the wasteland of Toronto's music scene save the odd scuttling bar band and the flotsam of other deserts being born into our desolation by the dry winds of boredom.

ELP is making an encore appearance at the Gardens on Feb. 2nd. The show will be a taxing 2½ hours long and promises to be even more boring than the CNE show. SAC will be sponsoring Bard at Con. Hall on the 15th of this month, and the immortal Ice Follies (American-McDonalds-it's-not-tacky-if-it's-clean-schlep on ice) will open on the 19th.

In the more avant garde jazz dept., the fascinating Carla Bley Band will be at the New Yorker on the 15th and Nihilist Spasm Band will be at the Music Gallery on the 4th of Feb. Le Group Mud, a Quebec based avant garde (God that's an ambiguous term) will be there tonight.

In the clubs tonight, the big excitement is the California based, all-girl (they're all under nineteen) Runaways at the El Mocambo. Hot stuff. Bananas is at the J. House, Subway Elvia is at the ever popular Nickelodeon, Tracy Nelson and the Mother Earth Band are at the Horseshoe, Mose Scarlett and Jim McLean are at the Riverboat, Dave Wilcox is at the Groaning Board and Mike Quatro is at the Gasworks.

At Dr. John's (U.C. Refectory) tonight we have the reasonably entertaining Downchild. But in this drought of musical titillation, playing god with ten Valiums in your system could be just as diverting.

movies

Friday: The Revue continues its policy of making life easier for me by offering a full week of Rohmer's The Marquise of O... That's a total of 749 minutes of non-stop talking, in German no less. On the other hand it's probably cheaper than a Berlitz course. Lumiere continues in its best continental manner with Bolognini's Down the Ancient Stairs and Malle's Lacoste, Lucien. The New Yorker also reveals remarkable consistency by showing The Rocky Horror Picture Show again and again and again. The people from the Guinness Book of Records will be taking photographs at the door. U of T Films has Lenny and New York, New York while Cinema Gratis (so there Steve) has Last Tango on the Gay Parterre in Gay Pares With Me (at Scar tonight and Med. Sci. tomorrow). And finally the Science Centre continues to provide the best movies in town with Paul Leni's silent classic The Man Who Laughs about a man who is condemned to bearing a rictus mortuus for finding Review headlines funny.

Saturday: Everyone repeats. Next year's mosquito crop should be a bumper.

Sunday: Innis revives and yawns with cartoons at 2:00 and 4:30 and Keaton's Spite Marriage at 7:30. Meanwhile the AGO slumbers peacefully and the New Yorker (in a belated fit of Christian charity) kills the screen for a night and let's Carla Bley pose as a yodelling ventriloquist for the evening.

Monday: A faint pulse is discerned in the corpse. Nothing to get excited about. No reason to call an ambulance but if paranoid politics are your idea of a good time you could amble over to Lumiere and catch two by Costas-Gavras Z and State of Siege. The manner in which Costas-Gavras manipulates his audience to the point that they begin to see ambivalences and complexities where none exist is fascinating to watch. Cassavetes's The Killing of a Chinese Bookie and Scorsese's Mean Streets move in on the New Yorker trying to hustle some business. They're both about the tough life of penny-ante hoods as they struggle against the crap-games of the President of the Immortals (Marion Brandt).

Tuesday: The Science Centre pushes on into the Malabar caves of Indian Cinema, and if your ears aren't still ringing from last you can catch Chomana's Drum a tale of untouchables. Also untouchable is the New Yorker program which is a repeat of my candidate for the worst possible double bill: Siddhartha and Steppenwolf.

Wednesday: Lumiere offers a program of Paris Vu Par (three shorts, one each by Godard, Chabrol, and Jean Rouch) and La Femme Infidel (which is probably the best version of the one film Chabrol ever makes, particularly with Stephanie Audran to stare at). The Science Centre has The Golden Fortress which concerns a cute kid and two comic creeps who've napped him and go running around backwoods Rajasthan in search of the Hindu version of El Dorado. OISE has also decided to follow the trail of the mysterious East. They got lost somewhere though and ended up in a class on contemporary Japanese sociology featuring The Autumn of the Kohayagawa Family and Double Suicide. If sociology's your first love, however, the best bet for a second term essay is an analysis of the crowd at the New Yorker's bill of Something For Everyone and Pumping Iron. You might use it as warm up for next week's debut of Seabastian.

Thursday: The Science Centre shifts focus and offers us India under the western eyes of Jean Renoir in The River. And, while everyone else is repeating, OISE does the Gishes with a pair of D.W. Griffith — Orphans of the Storm and Broken Blossoms.

Now that art has burst from a single-frame concept to a flashy frames-per-second, the AGO has deemed it necessary to officially explore video art. In Video combines video productions from 23 Canadian artists to celebrate 10 years of recognition as an art form. Sury Lake, a Montreal artist, presents vulnerability and stress in her video work and photography, also at the AGO till Feb. 26.

But the significant openings this week are the AGO's Lawren Harris exhibition, (admission only to groups of seven), and the 19th century British watercolours collection on tour from the National Gallery at the AGO. Both shows open tomorrow so if you're anywhere near a Dundas street car, go. Wednesday, the AGO smooths its feathers with a competitive show of 19th century watercolours by Canadian artists. Till Feb. 12. And you can catch David Levine at his satirical best and last before his exhibition of sketches closes on Sunday.

If you force yourself as a future investor, art is an escalating commodity, and Hart House assesses the Art Market this Wednesday evening in a seminar hosted by private collectors, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Jackman, 7 PM in the Bickerteth Room. Hart House Art Gallery features paintings and drawings by Mimi Matte.

An Exhibition of Native Canadian Art has been assembled at New College in the Ivey Library. All works are on loan from members of the university Faculty, so go and see which of your profs have tasteful, cultured home lives. Till Jan. 20.

Scarborough College Art Gallery offers a series of lectures accompanying their exhibition of medieval Islamic Textiles and artifacts on loan from the ROM. Till Feb. 13.

Gallery Moos has its usual fine mix of contemporary masters, with two major pieces by Gershon Jakovitz (that guy next to you in the Crest Grill), some Karel Appel paintings and a beautiful Marc Aurele Fortin painting from his idyllic fauve period. The Isaacs Gallery features Andrew Smith's Naked Clothing.

Antonio Andriero, a Uruguayan artist of note, has a show of etchings at the Albert White Gallery till Jan. 31. Joseph Hirsch, a representational artist from the States, has opened his first Toronto show at the Prince Arthur Galleries. Till Jan. 28. Paul Hunter's paintings may be seen at the Sable-Castelli Gallery till Jan. 21.

David Mirvish Gallery is concentrating on a group show of gallery artists till the end of the month when hopefully it will explore some fresh talent.

The Composer's String Quartet makes its Toronto debut tonight in the St. Lawrence Centre. The ensemble is known exclusively for its performances of contemporary American music, so their efforts with Beethoven's Op. 130 and Mozart's K. 465 will be revealing even to those who know them from records. Elliot Carter's Third Quartet (1972), a former Juilliard possession, is also programmed.

Another first is the Mendelmohr Choir's premiere of David Fanshawe's "African Sanctus" with Rozalind Roslak and Nexus. 8:00 at Metropolitan Indian Church (Queen and Bond), students $4. New Shafer wins

The CJRT orchestra under the direction of Paul Robinson presented the third in its Festival Series of concerts last Sunday with a program collectively called "A Little Night Music". All the CJRT concerts are organized in this way, each with a certain central theme, exploring a specific area of music. In theory it is an interesting way of unifying a program, but in practice it can result in an evening of oddly assorted pieces which don't add up to a satisfying whole. This is unfortunately what happened on Sunday night.

The first part of the concert consisted of a miniature piano recital by Kathryn Root, who played five Nocturnes; two by John Field, the first two of Chopin's Op. 9 and Faure's Op. 33 No. 2. All of them were never less than competently played, but seldom rose above that level either. Miss Root could be slightly hurried and inexpressive, although she displayed a nice control of the various trills, scales, and other embellishments which are such an important part of this kind of music.

The orchestral part of the evening got off to an equally unmemorable start with a dutiful rendition of Mozart's Serenade No. 6, in D ("Serenata Notturna"), which, in spite of the title, has nothing to do with night at all, as Mr. Robinson admitted in his pre-concert speech. The work is a moderately beguiling piece of Tafelmusik, more archaic in style than some of the "entertainment" music Mozart wrote (Eine Kleine Nachtmusik is a better-known example). While I'm sure it provided a pleasant aid to digestion for whichever noble patron commissioned it, it seems unsuited to the solemn scrutiny of a paying symphony concert audience.

Murray Shafer's Hymn to Night, on the other hand, can bear a good deal of scrutiny. Commissioned by the CJRT orchestra, and receiving its premiere at this concert, it was easily the highlight of the evening, which cannot always be said of the "Canadian Content" items which turn up on orchestral programs from time to time. In addition to an orchestra it calls for a pre-recorded tape and a soprano soloist, who sings a German text adapted from the poet Novalis. What I found so satisfying about the work was the way it combined various typically modernistic devices — string and vocal glissandos, for example, and extensive percussion with a lyricism and melodic sweep. The central and closing sections for voice and tape alone were similarly convincing, and appropriately haunting (the text refers to "the holy, ineffable, mysterious Night . . . Waste and solitary is its state . . ."), rather than smacking of gratuitous avant-gardery, as happens far too often when contemporary composers lay their hands on a tape recorder and associated electronic gadgetry. One hearing is obviously not enough to appreciate it fully, but the overall first impression is of a well-written piece of considerable direct appeal, with many nicely judged orchestral and vocal effects.

The singer on this occasion was Riki Turofsky, some one I had been anticipating with mixed feelings, since it has previously been my experience that while she is undoubtedly svelte of figure and the owner of an impressive Pepsodent smile, her purely vocal allure is less pronounced. However, her performance on Sunday was really quite remarkable. The piece was probably written with a view to her fairly brilliant top register, since she has had in the past projection problems in the middle of her voice. There was the odd moment of uncertain pitch, but on the whole she coped well with what must be a difficult score. The orchestra, too, played well, under the skillful leadership of Mr. Robinson.

Women's Basketball Close Behind Waterloo

By JEANNE GRAY

The University of Toronto women's basketball team, coming off a very hectic week-end tournament schedule, resumed league play last Wednesday night by hosting the University of Waterloo. In a game which displayed considerable offensive skills by both parties, U of Waterloo emerged victorious in overtime. The final tally was 61-59.

Losing the game was a blow to the team, as they demonstrated throughout the match that they were the better squad. They out-hustled, out-rebounded and out-shot their opposition.

Barb Grochowski led the team as high scorer with 16 points, while Sharon Kosmachuk made her mark, with most rebounds. The team shot 50 per cent from the free throw line and Jane Leuty managed to sink 5 from the foul line.

Unfortunately, the Blues also tallied the highest number of turnovers. This could be attributed to a powerful Waterloo defense, which successfully anticipated passes, keeping the Lady Blues in check for part of the night.

The Ladies from Waterloo also took control of the mid-court area, effectively stopping the Blues on many occasions. Even against this defence, however, Karen Pim was a standout, as she sparked the Blues offensive.

Having lost this contest only adds to the necessity of beating Queen's this week-end, if the Blues are to stay in contention for a play-off position. The team is confident, that if they are able to consistently combine a potent offense with their disciplined style of defense the win will surely be theirs.

Lady Foilists Triumphant

By SUE LANGLEY

For the first time in two years the university of Toronto fielded two women's foil teams at the York Invitational Fencing Competition on Sunday.

The format of the tournament consisted of three pools of three teams each. The top two teams from each pool advanced to the sudden death semi-finals with the three finalists competing in a round robin match.

The second team was made up of Barb Moser, Charlene Davis, Janice Page and Margaret Found, who was borrowed from McMaster. The girls fenced admirably against teams from Queen's and Trent and despite a lack of competition experience, only narrowly missed advancing from their pool.

The Toronto A team, made up of Alice Chan, Lily Dobay, Debbie Frankish and Sue Langley, emerged victorious after an extremely long day, after defeating Brock and Queen's 9-0 in the semi-final. The final match was set up such that two bouts took place simultaneously — a speedy but tiring method. York was defeated 16-0 and in another effort to save time, it was decided that the Western-U of T match would go to the first team with nine victories. The match exhibited some of the best teamwork seen this year and left Toronto's victory record intact.

The teams wish to express their gratitude to Maitre Wood for his uncanny ability to be everywhere at once and for his training, advice and moral support.

Don't Foul Around With Simon Fraser

By PETER HOHENADEL

Simon Fraser Clansmen outshot U of T Varsity Blues 91-79 in an exhibition basketball game played in the Benson Building on Tuesday night. Both teams were guilty of poor shooting and costly turnovers, although the Clansmen maintained the lead throughout the contest.

For the Blues, Tuesday night's contest was their first match since December 3. The team's lack of practice showed up in their inconsistent shooting and porous defence. Many of the Blues' passes were picked off by an alert Clansmen defense.

While the Blues suffered from a lack of practice, the Simon Fraser team was equally hampered by their rigorous schedule. The Clansmen have been travelling for almost three weeks, playing the Acadia tournament in Nova Scotia and various exhibition games. Their game against the Blues was their seventh contest in eight days. Coach Stan Stewardson relied heavily on his bench strength to relieve his weary first-stringers.

In the first half, the teams appeared to be evenly matched. The Clansmen worked well against the Blues defence, often penetrating into the key for easy layups. The dependable outside shooting of Tom Skerlak and Jay Triano kept Clansmen in the lead when the Blues defence tightened up.

The Clansmen's fast break strategy gave the Blues their chance to stay in the game. Simon Fraser made too many mistakes trying to bring the ball upcourt quickly, and the Blues' aggressive coverage capitalized on the Clansmen's turnovers. The first half ended with the visitors ahead, 42-40.

In the second half, the Blues soon got into serious foul trouble. With 17:48 left to play in the second half, Blues centre Randy Cook's aggressive play under the boards earned him his fourth foul, forcing coach John McManus to bench Cook until the third quarter. Shortly after Cook's foul, forward Joe Braunstein fouled out, as did Frank Wenzl.

With three members of the Blues

starting lineup on the bench, the Clansmen ran away with the game, building up to a 16 point lead in the third quarter. The Clansmen proved they were the superior ballhandlers, as their offense continued to work smoothly.

The Clansmen intermittently worked a full court press on the Blues, often forcing the home team into a turnover. The Blues countered with an effective fast break that forced Simon Fraser off the press.

In the fourth quarter, the Clansmen coach began to rest his first string players. In the dying minutes of the game, the Blues finally started to connect, bringing the Clansmen's winning margin down to a respectable 12 points.

High scorer for the Blues was guard Tom McGhie with 18 points. McGhie was the best shooter for the Blues, as well as playing an outstanding game defensively. Centre Randy Cook scored 17 points and grabbed 15 rebounds for the Blues.

Ontario natives Jay Triano and Tom Skerlak led the Clansmen with 28 and 21 points respectively. Skerlak, a member of Canada's national team, was the best shooter on the court for either team.

The Simon Fraser team is something of a maverick in relation to other Canadian university teams. The school's policy of open athletic scholarships enables them to attract stars like Triano and Skerlak. The Clansmen play in a league with American universities.

After the game, Blues Coach John McManus said, "I was happy with the way we played," considering the team's lack of practice. "The Clansmen are a tough ball club."

Tom Skerlak shows why he is a member of the National Team as he goes in for a layup.

Randy Cook overpowers an opponent to get a shot away.

Forestry Ties Scarborough In Game Of The Week

By JIM McLEAN

Wednesday night's hockey game between Scarborough B and Forestry A demonstrated that both teams, although near last place in their respective divisions, have maintained a competitive attitude, by deadlocking in a 2-2 tie.

It was Mike Middleton who paced Scarborough with two goals while Forestry's Kokeli collected two points with a goal and an assist.

The scoring opened on a play by Mike Middleton. Scarborough's consistent forechecking helped them maintain their 1-0 lead until Forestry finally got untracked with a goal by Kokeli from R. Landry. Other than a few discretion calls the officiating remained quite consistent, although Forestry's hockey groupies have yet to be convinced that Scarborough was not given a slight bias.

If it wasn't for Forestry's spirited defensive effort while two men short Scarborough's power play probably would not have been shut out. This alone seemed to contribute to Scarborough's chaotic style near the end of the first half.

With one player already badly injured, Scarborough had to rely on their bench strength of less than two lines. Forestry started to play a more confident style of game giving them many scoring opportunities.

The Maroons, on the other hand, seemed to lack the stamina necessary for a successful offensive rush. It wasn't until the middle of the second period that Scarborough went ahead with an unassisted goal by Middleton.

With less than three minutes remaining Forestry replied with a goal by Z. Big to tie the game at two.

With the score tied, Scarborough was assessed a questionable penalty in the last minute for changing lines during a stoppage in play. The odd thing about the penalty was that both teams were guilty of this infraction throughout the game.

Although the game ended in a tie it seemed exciting enough to entertain the 'capacity' crowd of about five music and twenty-five Forestry students. Maybe if other interfac teams were accompanied by the same 'sellout' the players would show their appreciation by providing some entertaining hockey.

Blues Ready To Go

The hockey Blues open the post-Christmas segment of their OUAA schedule with a Friday night game against the Laurentian University Voyageurs.

The unpredictable Voyageurs come to Toronto on the heels of an impressive 7-5 victory over the York Yeomen. That win moved Laurentian into a second place tie in the Eastern division with the Yeomen.

On a team which has more desire than talent coach Billy Harris must be pleased with the play of centre Lou Clements. Clements is presently the only non-Blue among the league's top scorers with five goals and 15 assists.

Coach Tom Watt is looking forward to the second half of the schedule and defence of the nation's number one ranking earned in the first term. With the Blues' schedule it seems unlikely they will lose many games. Seven of their last 11 games are to be played on home ice. Their only road trips will be to Guelph (two wins, six losses), Ottawa (three wins, five losses) and Western (six wins, two ties).

If the Blues continue to score like they did in the first term they will be unbeatable. Four of the league's top five scorers come from the Blues. Doug Caines continues to lead, with Alex Jeans, Cary Farrell and Larry Hopkins in hot pursuit.

By JIM O'LEARY

The U of T wrestling Blues had their finest day of the season on Wednesday as they swept all six matches in a dual meet against Waterloo.

All together they fought twelve fights but only six were OUAA sanctioned. Fights between combatants of different weight classes are not recognized by the OUAA. The only exception to this is if a wrestler chooses to fight one weight class higher than that he is qualified for.

Rob Moore turned in a sparkling performance. Taking advantage of the rule allowing competition in a higher weight class, Moore fought in the 150 pound class instead of as a 142 pounder. The weight difference seemed to have little effect as he dominated his opponent taking a lopsided 7-1 victory.

In the 118 pound class Al Tamane took a 7-3 victory. Other winners for the Blues were Sam Turchiaro (134 pounds), Bill Hogarth (167 pounds), Jack Preoburazinski (177 pounds) and John Brown (190 pounds).

In exhibition matches, Moore and Hogarth registered additional victories while Sam Turchiaro, Keith Barry and John Brown lost their bouts. It should be kept in mind however that these losses were incurred against opponents of higher weight classes. John Brown, for example, fought an opponent who outweighed him by more than 20 pounds.

Coach Joe Rabel was naturally pleased with the performance of his wrestlers. He points out, however, that this team was not Toronto's strongest. Academic commitments and injuries forced a number of wrestlers to stay at home.

The Blues now begin preparation for a tough meet at Queen's. At this tournament will be teams from the United States and the universities of Western and Guelph.

The Americans are always strong while Western, Guelph and Toronto are expected to battle it out for the top three spots in Ontario. Guelph is generally conceded the number one position while Toronto and Western are expected to battle right down to the wire for second place.

T Holders Award

A new award for athletic excellence together with high academic performance will be given annually to one male and one female U of T undergraduate student.

The Board of Directors of the T-Holders Association, an organization of U of T graduates who have earned their athletic letter, have approved in principle the establishment of this award, to be presented to the "most outstanding undergraduate male and female athletes with 'B' averages in academics."

The award will consist of a special plaque with a painted metal "T" as well as a plaque engraved with the winner's name. The recipients' names will be painted on a display board in the Benson Building and they will receive $150 from the association at the time their awards are presented.

Nominations for the awards will be made by the Excellence Committee and the presentations will take place at an "appropriate athletic function on the campus."

Prerequisite for ECO 100?

By GORDON HERTZMAN

A first-year economics course, a pre-requisite for a university degree in Commerce, Economics or Political Science, may be restricted as early as September 1978 to entering students with a grade average of at least 80 per cent in Grade XIII.

This recommendation and others, designed to meet departmental cutbacks, are contained in a memorandum sent to Political Economy Course Union (PECU) President Harvey Cooper on Wednesday. The author of the memorandum, Political Economy Chairman Ian Drummond, said in his brief that Faculty of Arts and Science Dean Arthur Kruger "has agreed that we may impose such a standard" for ECO 100 and proposes the 1978-79 date for implementation.

A spokesman at the Office of Admissions and Awards said the Political Economy Department solution to control first year enrolments is "unprecedented." Never before has a first-year course at U of T denied access to a student on the basis of his average, he said.

In his memorandum Drummond cites as grounds for imposing enrolment restrictions on the need to "release staff resources for upper-level work." The alternative to the restrictions — holding ECO 100 in larger classrooms — he rejects as impractical.

Drummond admits "there is no very satisfactory way" to deal with the increasing number of students entering the department which has an increasingly tight budget. However, he said the mark restriction policy seemed to be the least objectionable one to follow. Furthermore, it will reduce enrolment in ECO 100 and COM 100 by as much as one-third and bring the student-teacher ratio to a more desirable range.

Although Drummond requested suggestions, "proposals and comments about the syllabus" Cooper objected to the formulation of the policy without prior student consultation. Cooper, who said that PECU and Drummond would meet to discuss possible alternatives, preferred a policy of larger classes or enrolment on a first-come, first-serve basis.

Economics courses should not be like law school, said Cooper. He also feared that the new mark restriction would generate an atmosphere of unhealthy competition in the department.

Drummond argued that a first-come, first-serve basis was unfair to students who registered late. He suggested a lottery as a means of determining candidates, a system which would be "equally unfair to all," he said.

While Political Economy students may suffer through these enrolment restrictions, Drummond in his letter told Cooper that the department had agreed to allow students to sit on "undergraduate curriculum bodies wherever these may exist." However he warned that the department expressed unwillingness to "invent bodies where these do not exist" and that curriculum bodies are advisory only — "the university's rules are quite clear about where the ultimate authority lies," his letter reads.

Ed Broadbent: job creation

By SHANE PARKHILL

"We have the worst employment record for a country in the industrialized world" Ed Broadbent, federal New Democratic Party leader, told a capacity audience at the Roberts Faculty of Library Science Thursday afternoon. Broadbent was participating in the first of a series of forums sponsored by The Graduate Student Working Group on Employment.

Ed Broadbent

Leo Casey, Vice-President of the Graduate Students Union (GSU) and Chairman of the forum, explained that the Liberal and Conservative parties had also received invitations, but had felt it was not appropriate to send either their federal leaders or employment or finance ministers. "Only one federal party leader has considered it of enough importance" to attend, Casey added.

Broadbent explained that to deal with student unemployment it is necessary to look at unemployment in general, and that the one required a solution to the other. He stressed that any society that is "worth a damn" must make it possible for people to work. As an illustration of the gravity of the present situation, he told of how hundreds of young people in Abbotsford, B.C., had competed for jobs paying minimum wage at a McDonald's restaurant, many of them camping out overnight to be first to apply. He pointed out that Newfoundland is presently suffering as high a level of unemployment as it did in 1932, in the depths of the depression, and that New Brunswick has almost reached its depression-level jobless rate.

Broadbent described as

"complete, utter rubbish" Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's view that the federal government was hampered in dealing with unemployment because of the global nature of the problems. He pointed out that the United States' jobless rate is only 6.5 per cent, that of France 5.5 per cent, West Germany 4.8 per cent and Japan and Sweden just over 2 per cent, all significantly less than Canada's.

As measures to counter this situation, Broadbent proposed on behalf of his party major tax concessions for middle and low-income earners and a significant increase of federal expenditures on housing, particularly for those with moderate and poor incomes.

Broadbent also emphasized the need for a $2 billion capital works assistance program for projects such as sewers and hospitals designated as priorities by municipalities. The cost of the program would be largely recovered through increased tax revenues and savings in unemployment insurance and welfare payments.

Broadbent also spoke of the need for a restructuring of the Canadian

A Toronto bylaw restricting vending trucks from staying in one spot for more than 10 minutes was enforced on Wednesday against the catering trucks that habitually park in front of the Sidney Smith building.

Metro policeman Brian Brown told seven truck vendors along St. George Street that he would return at 3 p.m. to enforce the law, which also prevents trucks from selling on the same block for more than 30 minutes in any day. By that hour most of the trucks had left.

Brown said that "someone" in the Sidney Smith Building had complained. A check with 52 Division revealed that no formal complaints had been lodged with them.

Vendors said someone had complained that they were taking up parking space. The possible consequences of the continuous enforcement left the vendors distressed about their future.

Howard McKinnon, who has worked solely at the St. George campus since the construction of Sid Smith, said that if the bylaw continues to be enforced, "I'll be out of luck. I've been in one job for 20 years. What am I going to do?"

Noting that the bylaw had been enforced very rarely in the past,

McKinnon nevertheless objected to the term "police harassment": "The cop is just doing what he's told to do. He has no choice."

Vendor Bill Lawson said the police last enforced the bylaw on campus in 1968. "I got tickets in that year while working for another vendor," he said. "One week we were fined $400. The license was suspended for two weeks."

Lawson, who has operated the truck since 1964, said he would not be able to fight the tickets if the bylaw were enforced. "You can only take so much pressure. Once you have moved your truck you can't get the same spot."

McKinnon explained that control of a favorable position forms a crucial part of the assets of his business. The competition that exists among vendors for the best spots once led to his being stabbed in the hand with an ice pick, he said.

Bob Kellachan was also worried about enforcement of the bylaw. "I'm paying a lot of money for the mortgages on my house and on my truck," he said. (The truck was purchased in September for $14,000.) Kellachan said the fines could force him to sell car parts, a job he held before operating the vending machine.

Ward Six Alderman Allan Sparrow said truck vendors have complained to him in the past. He agreed with the general principle of the bylaw but that "certain circumstances should be reconsidered."

Vendors at the site said late yesterday afternoon that police hadn't been around that day. But said Bob Kellachan, "he said he'd be back."

Students say no

By PETER HOENADEL

U of T students are concerned about the recent conflict surrounding six food trucks occupying parking spaces on St. George St. between Harbord and College Streets.

Herald Schraeder, undergraduate student at New College, is a daily customer of the catering service. "It's easier to stop here than it is to go over to Hart House," Schraeder said. He feels that the food trucks perform an essential service.

Victoria College student Diana Lloyd is unsympathetic to the plight of the caterers. "If they're breaking the law, they shouldn't be here at all," she said. There are other places to go and eat," Lloyd said.

Alfred Neuman, an undergrad at University College, uses the food trucks "at least two times a day. I think they have to be here," Neuman said.

Truck route to go through Trinity College

By TOM KUHN

The U of T, Trinity College, and the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) have reached an agreement on the truck route through Trinity College grounds to the proposed construction site at ROM.

The Trinity College route, confirmed at a meeting between the three groups yesterday morning, goes through the Larkin parking lot and the Trinity playing fields. It is the best arrangement and the least disruptive, said U of T President John Evans.

The access road will be built this spring. It will intersect Philosopher's Walk where a flagman will be stationed to direct traffic.

"This route will cause minimum disruption to Philosopher's Walk, minimum disruption to the Faculty of Music, and none to Law," said Evans.

Truck routes directly off Queen's Park Crescent would have had severe restrictions by the Metro Road Commission causing large problems with the construction timetable and costs.

Metro Roads prohibited stacking trucks one behind the other on Queen's Park Crescent for access to the construction site. They also forbade trucks from backing out onto Queen's Park Crescent from the site.

"There would be no turnaround space for trucks for certain times during construction," said Graupner.

Graupner suggested to the university that a road be constructed for one-way traffic from Devonshire Place by the Edward Johnson Music Building. This plan however would have increased traffic at the Johnson building.

The route from Trinity is much further from the buildings than a route right next to the Johnson Building, said Graupner. Truck traffic will turn around and go back out to Devonshire Place under current arrangements.

Evans presented the administration's position to Governing Council which gave its approval last night.

Trinity has had a committee studying the problem under Vice-Provost Alexander Dalzell. The agreement with the federated college was approved by its executive committee in principle last night.

Trinity will impose several restrictions on the truck traffic through its property, said Dalzell.

"Wooden partitions will be constructed to lessen noise and dirt from the truck access road," said Dalzell. Truck routing will be from the north, and security will be provided for the parking space, as well as other legal restrictions imposed on the contractors, he said.

Parking space lost will be provided at other university lots. Time restrictions will limit truck access. "We would like to see the trucks come after 8 o'clock in the morning. It goes right past bedrooms at Trinity," said Dalzell.

Construction on the museum site is expected to last over two years. Actual construction will not start until the summer, although the access routes will probably be built in the spring, said Dalzell.

Path long-trodden by robed Trins will be a truck route to the ROM.

STAFF, STUDENTS AND THE PUBLIC ARE CORDIALLY INVITED

Campus centre back to the drawing boards

By HARRY TORCH

The idea of the Campus as Campus Center, in a much-diminished form, squeaked past the Governing Council last night. The Council voted substantially to remove the no-net-cost restriction from lounge space, and put a student on the South-West Campus Development Committee, but not without much debate.

The idea of a campus center for students first arose in the sixties and ran a twisted course through the university bureaucracy, always changing its form but never actually reaching the building stage. It was always held back by the fact that it had to pay for itself.

The Planning and Resources Committee last December recommended lifting that restriction on the lounge space but not on the landscaping involved, and allowing students to have direct input in the next area on campus to be developed, the south-west campus.

Governing Council members last night were unsure of what they were getting into. Government appointee William Broadhurst wanted to know the cost of incorporating the center into the development. "We're committing the university to a project without knowing the actual cost of the project," he said.

Government appointee Sonja Sinclair said she was against the motion from the first because the public might think it frivolous.

She said throwing away the no-net-cost principle was "extravagant to say the least." She also said she was concerned about "the open-endedness of this scheme. We're letting ourselves into a completely unknown cost."

President Evans and Professor Bennet Kovrig, Vice-Chairman and spokesman of the Planning and Priorities Subcommittee, repeatedly pointed out that the council was only approving the idea in principle, as a "change in the direction of planning." Evans said he was willing to have a cost limit set on the center, as a "form of discipline."

Council members also spent time wondering about the wording of the motion. They were not sure how the Campus as Campus Center, which had been submitted by the Students' Administrative Council as including all of the area west of St. George Street, could be incorporated into the plan for developing the South-West Campus, which is west of Huron Street and south of Willcocks.

An attempt by Professor Coutts to increase the number of students on the Development Committee met with sharp words from President Evans. "If the Governing Council wants to strike a User's Committee (the type of committee this was) it should do so," but until then he would like to have the freedom to choose the people he thought most fit to the committees he was required to form.

Sex with your clams? Ask Key

By SEAN DUNPHY

Sex in advertising appears to be the most popular form of "subliminal seduction", according to expert Wilson Bryan Key, and the more taboo the better.

Speaking at Convocation Hall on Wednesday, Key, who taught sociology at the University of Western Ontario for six years, explained that clams in a Howard Johnson placemat advertising their clam dish were not in fact clams. The clams all had human figures, and were engaging in some form of communal sex with a dog thrown in for good measure.

Subliminal messages are commonly applied through airbrushing techniques and composite photography, Key said. In many cases what appears to be a still photograph of a glass of gin is in fact completely animated.

These subliminal messages are, according to Key, instantaneously perceived by the subconscious. He said research has revealed that subliminal messages can be perceived in as little as one seven-thousandth of a second. Theories on the ways in which these impressions affect the unconscious and in turn the conscious are purely conjecture, he said.

According to Key, the American advertising industry spent $31 billion last year, $800 million of it on advertising.

Key presented slide demonstrations of many examples in magazines to back up his theory. He added that he knows many people who have admitted to having produced similar ads. That these techniques work, said Key, is demonstrated by the amount of money they represent. The advertising industry has invested millions of dollars in ads and in researching their effectiveness. He cited an ad campaign costing $2 million. Assuming a 5 percent of sales advertising budget, he calculated that one photograph would have to generate $40 million in sales to justify the investment.

Key said that other principal themes involved in subliminal advertising are death, religion and fear.

Key produced a slide of a Johnny Walker scotch ad that depicted 15 nightmarish scenes embedded in the ice cubes. He said the scenes are similar to documented nightmares of alcoholics going through withdrawal.

Cigarette ads also employ death and fear themes, said Key. He showed a Benson and Hedges advertisement of two wrestling hockey players. One player had a hockey glove clearly identifiable as Cooper while the other glove in the foreground was slightly blurred. Upon enlargement the glove read very clearly "cancer". Key emphasized that nobody knows why such a suggestion would sell cigarettes, but the fact is that it does.

Religious themes, he said, are constantly being used and contrasted with the profane. He produced as evidence a close-up of a Chivas Regal advertisement showing a very clear portrait of Christ in one corner of the drink, smiling benignly down on a man in flowing robes, and a girl on her knees with her head between the man's legs.

Even Picasso, according to Key, was not unaware of the possibilities of subliminal implantation. He showed Picasso's "Woman Asleep With a Dream". A woman sleeping in a chair has a curiously divided head. According to Key, her dream is found here: One part of her head forms the shape of a penis and her hands, resting on her lap, have six fingers each — a common method, said Key, of indicating motion.

The images implanted are not always photographs but would fall, he said, between reality and something similar to inkblots. They would be realistic enough for most people to receive the same subconscious impression.

The next 10 years, Key concluded, will see fantastic growth in the field of subliminal psychology as more and more research is carried out and old barriers are lifted. He pointed to studies indicating that subliminal induction has been effective in reaching the subconscious of people with problems ranging from schizophrenia to stuttering. In his forthcoming book, he will reveal details of more than 10 years of such research by the CIA and the US military.

Careful examination of this photo reveals the words "Buy my book" subliminally written in Dr. Key's eyebrows.

York prof reinstated, ban lifted

By ERIC McMILLAN

York University professor Jeffrey Forest, who says he was suspended due to "political persecution," received his job back Tuesday.

Forest was arrested November 18 with two other supporters of the York Student Movement (YSM) during a confrontation with Zionists in the university's Central Square.

Forest was suspended and banned from campus three days later without an investigation or hearing.

YSM charged the incident began with an attack on its literature table featuring literature from the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) with which YSM is affiliated. Zionists objected to the sale of "Zionism is Racism", a booklet containing articles against Zionism and supporting the Palestine Liberation Organization. YSM charged the attack and others that followed were by an alliance of certain Zionists, administrators, police and leaders of the student council.

An Ad Hoc Committee to Oppose Political Persecution was formed at a meeting of 60 students after the suspension. The outcry succeeded in lifting a ban against the YSM literature table.

The first trial of an arrested YSM supporter January 17 resulted in charges of "causing a disturbance by fighting" being dropped. Defendant Jim Nugent said the judge stopped the trial before he could finish cross-examining the first prosecution witness, a policeman.

Forest received a letter from York president Ian Macdonald this week advising "your suspension and ban from campus is now lifted and you may return to your employment in the university."

The letter dated January 13 also contained an official reprimand and asked Forest to "keep the peace and maintain good conduct" at the university. Macdonald justified the suspension as preventing danger of further violence and possibly physical injury.

Forest responded to Macdonald in a letter yesterday charging Macdonald did not investigate the case. He also rejected the "arbitrary and unjust reprimand" as continuing on "the road of malicious political, social and academic persecution of myself."

Nugent said the reinstatement is not a victory in the same way the curtailed trial was. "It's a demand for capitulation," he said. "Dr. Forest is being asked to return on the administration's terms. It hasn't stopped them continuing to attack YSM."

Forest said he would elaborate on his views of the entire matter in detail in a statement to be released on Monday, January 23, in the York Faculty Lounge.

The trials of Forest and York campus worker Barbara Nunn will begin next Thursday.

Scar finance report soon

By RICK BOGACZ

A report concerning the handling of student council finances by the Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) over the last three years is still in the planning stages. The report, being prepared by Professor J. Ed. Smyth of the Political Economy Department on the St. George campus, was originally slated to be completed by the end of October.

Smyth said yesterday he thought it would be unfair to Scarborough College Principal Joan Foley, who requested the report, and the SCSC to make any remarks about specific items which will appear in the report.

Smyth said that if he were given permission by Foley, he would comment on the report in four to five weeks, although he did not guarantee that the report would be completed by this time.

Staff meeting at noon

Tomorrow at noon the Varsity confronts the most fundamental of all questions: Why publish? On hand will be several people who claim to have the answer. Whether you have an answer or not however, it is important to show and say your piece.

After the question of the Varsity's existence has been settled we will confront the second most important question: Why do we belong to Canadian University Press (CUP)? Again we need your help.

Come and join the fray. It promises to be a memorable experience.

Graduate Student Union defends handling of Parrott meeting

We would like to commend the Varsity staff for the excellent reporting of Dr. Parrott's recent visit to the University of Toronto to discuss his new student aid programme. The news articles printed in last Friday's (13 January) edition provided a full and accurate account of the meeting's proceedings.

Unfortunately, this coverage stands in stark contrast to the unprofessional editorial, personally signed by the editor-in-chief, Mario Cutajar, that marred the same issue of the paper. Cutajar's account seriously misrepresents the events of that meeting, as anyone of the seven hundred students in attendance could confirm. And these misrepresentations are purposeful: they are designed to paint the chairman of the meeting as capricious and undemocratic and the representatives of the Ontario Federation of Students as domineering.

We write to correct these willful distortions. We do so not in fear that Cutajar's prose will be taken as a factual account of the proceedings; university community members have had ample opportunity to familiarize themselves with the objectivity of the Varsity's editor over the past four months. We do so because it is important that those students who were unable to attend the meeting should have an opportunity to hear the background that lay behind Cutajar's charges.

Let us take the allegations one by one. Cutajar: "We did not expect, for example, that the chairman would take it upon himself to limit the question period." At the commencement of the meeting, the chairman outlined the agenda for the afternoon, which he explained had been set by the meeting's sponsors, SAC and GSU, and not by himself. This agenda was closely followed: Miriam Edelson, the Chairperson of OFS, opened the meeting with a ten minute presentation on the history of student aid and the problems of the current programme. Dr. Parrott responded, and the floor was then open for questions for more than one and one-half hours. The question period was extended several times beyond the original limit before the meeting was concluded with a two minute summation by John Tuzyk, SAC President.

The chairman was unable to extend the question period any further than he had already done because Dr. Parrott's long-awaited visit to this campus was premised on an agreement between democratically elected student representatives and his office, an agreement which established the length of the meeting. Cutajar is therefore arguing that the chairman should have broken our word to Dr. Parrott and extended a question period that had gone on for over ninety minutes and seen close to forty students ask questions. And it is he who describes the chairman as arbitrary!

Cutajar: "While OFS was allowed to make a lengthy statement at the beginning of the meeting other student militants were harassed and even cut off by the chair." We shall deal with Cutajar's comments on the OFS in a moment; for now let us focus on the charge that the chairman made it his task to limit discussion from the floor.

SAC and GSU agreed that a maximum of students should be able to query Dr. Parrott and to that end we decided to limit every question to two minutes, a limit announced at the commencement of the meeting. Many of the thirty or so students who questioned Dr. Parrott would have welcomed a chance to query him longer. Some of these students had been working on SAC and GSU student aid committees for months and they were, as the quality of their questions demonstrated, extremely well-prepared to face Dr. Parrott. But each of these students recognized that additional time for themselves would deny a fellow student any opportunity to query Parrott and so they willingly accepted the limit.

As always, there were two speakers, neither of which had any questions for Dr. Parrott, who decided that they deserved more time than the other students. In both cases, their missionary zeal and calls for conversion to the one true faith were met with considerable displeasure from the floor. And in both cases, the chairman intervened only when the speaker had exceeded the allotted time. No responsible chairman could have done otherwise.

Cutajar: "One came away with the impression that OFS did not want anybody to contest its monopolization of the correct position... OFS was allowed to make a lengthy statement at the beginning of the meeting... It would seem that OFS views itself as the brains and only needs students for muscle." It takes a somewhat convoluted, if nonetheless amusing, logic to translate a ten minute presentation by one person at the beginning of a two-hour meeting into "monopolization". But this fact is not all that difficult for Cutajar for it comes only after a year of editorial disparagement of every democratically elected student representative organization within reach. Cutajar's real complaint is that OFS, which has failed to accept his revealed truth, spoke at all. As the Varsity editorials have explained in the past, OFS is only interested in "crumbs", such as whether the sons and daughters of working people are given access to Ontario universities, whether international students are forced to pay differential fees, and whether students are able to find summer and post-graduate employment.

We could not agree more. And we, as well as the remainder members of OFS, are more than willing to leave the important, burning issues of the Canadian student movement, such as the leading role of Enver Hoxha and the Albanian Party of Labour in the International Communist (Marxist-Leninist) Movement and the virtues of urban terrorism, anarchism and the Baader-Meinhoff gang, to the able hands of the Varsity's editor. We stand convicted of fighting for crumbs.

Cutajar: "Instead we were treated to a sparring match between a government bureaucrat and several student bureaucrats."

It would have been difficult to find a more appropriate ending to this editorial. It started as an ostensible review of Dr. Parrott's visit to the campus, but halfway through the temptation became too much. Why attack Dr. Parrott when you have your fellow students and the democratic organizations that represent them as a target? The most complete expression of this attitude is the concluding remark. You seven hundred students who turned out, not because you harboured any illusions about the

Once again you have managed to pollute the campus with your own particular brand of pseudo-intellectual nonsense. I refer to the mindless diatribe of an editorial "Now What Harry" which materialized in the Friday, January 13 issue of The Varsity. I will not comment on the first part of your editorial which contained the usual misguided class analysis of our society which we've all heard before, i.e. — don't, of course, do anything constructive or reasonable in society because that would be tantamount to conspiring with the evil forces of capitalism and democracy. With regard to your complaints about the organization of the meeting with Dr. Parrott, essentially your long infantile whine stems merely from the fact that the question period was cut off before your high and exalted self was allowed to ask Dr. Parrott a question. (It seems curious that you wanted to ask him one in the first place considering how you did not believe anything could be accomplished in terms of dialogue with the Minister.) You did not, however, mention this in your editorial. Also, the time of adjournment was announced at the beginning of the meeting as 5:30 p.m. With the Minister's indulgence, though, it was allowed eventually to go on until 5:50 p.m. — twenty minutes beyond the scheduled time of adjournment.

Minister's intention, but because you wanted to demonstrate to him as clearly as possible your concern and your organization; you scores of students who have worked on the student aid committees and who did your best to make that meeting a powerful expression of student opinion; you thirty or so students who brought forward well-researched and articulate questions on the new programme: in the eyes of the Varsity's editor you were, at best, spectators in a battle of elites and if you talked, a student bureaucrat. Need we say more?

Also, at no time during the meeting did OFS attempt to monopolize the meeting so that only their position was presented. Instead, the chairman of OFS, Miriam Edelson, merely raised several questions at the outset which she hoped would be answered by Dr. Parrott during the course of the meeting. As well, all speakers were warned at the beginning of the meeting, and at times throughout it, that they would be allowed only 2 minutes to frame their questions or statements. However, a couple of boorish, self-styled, selfish militant bazaros attempted to carve out more than two minutes for themselves in order to deliver the same kind of mindless drivel which you serve up regularly in your editorials. They were not "harassed or... cut off by the chair." By going over their allotted time they cut themselves off.

Finally, in your climactic distortion of the general atmosphere and structure of the meeting you dismiss the meeting as a "Sparring match between a government bureaucrat and several student bureaucrats." Well, Commander Cutajar I suggest that you just ask some of the Meds., Arts and Science, Architecture, etc. students who got up and spoke to the Minister if they consider themselves to be bureaucrats. The only bureaucrats I saw at the meeting were a couple of ill-mannered, quasi-revolutionaries like yourself. As always, you wouldn't know a real student even if he or she stepped up to you and poked you in the beret.

Lies and slander: we're familiar with it

My, my how indignant you petty bureaucrats can get. Someone new to the game might actually start to suspect that you're alive.

Well it's always instructive to watch bureaucrats getting angry since that's when they're most likely to expose themselves for the demagogues they are. Your reaction to last Friday's editorial is a perfect illustration of this. In fact you couldn't have provided us with a better demonstration of the bankruptcy and opportunism of the politics you're trying to foist on U of T students.

For it is only just and fitting that the only defense possible of the Ontario Federation of Students' and the Graduate Students Union's handling of the Parrott meeting has to be based on lies, slander and outright red-baiting.

The GSU charges "misrepresentation". Not only that but I dared imply in my editorial that "democratically elected student representatives" should have broken their solemn, professional word to Parrott and extended the question period beyond the time planned for it. How boorish of me to suggest that the Honourable Minister should have wasted 10 minutes more of his precious time talking to students. Fortunately Parrott has OFS and the GSU to protect him from such vulgarity.

"Democratically elected student representatives" eh? What about Parrott? Wasn't he democratically elected? Indeed what about the whole student aid fraud he's trying to put over us? Isn't that democratic too? Why oppose it at all? We understand your grovelling: it's the natural reaction of democratic souls like you to democratic policies like Parrott's.

The two militants the chair interrupted, you tell us, were cut off because they exceeded the allotted time. Lie. Speakers that went on for a longer period of time were not interrupted. What the representative of the Trotskyist League and the one from the Toronto Student Movement had to say should have had nothing to do with the chair's decision. Interestingly enough members of the Communist Party of Canada were not interfered with when they spoke. That other political groups were prevented from speaking was sheer sectarianism. And you only demonstrate your utter lack of principle when you stoop to red-baiting to justify the chair's interference. In this respect Brian O'Riordan is far more honest. His red-baiting is consistent with his reactionary politics. Yours was slimy opportunism.

How pious you are. You limited the time for your "well-prepared" questions so as not to deny the common folk the opportunity to ask their questions. But you were quite willing to cut off 5 or so students waiting to ask their questions. If there was dirty work to be done why didn't you let Parrott do it? But of course you didn't want to embarrass the minister. That would have meant compromising your position. He might have become upset with you and refused to invite you to his next tea-party.

"We stand convicted of fighting for crumbs." For all your hot air about accessibility and student employment your achievements to date are abysmal and your prospects for the future even bleaker. Your idea of organizing students to defend themselves is to have a few specialists like yourselves intercede with the minister on behalf of the rest of us. It must be fun to play diplomacy like real bureaucrats. But then it's not your future you are playing with.

And what's this garbage about "the virtues of urban terrorism, anarchism and the Baader-Meinhoff gang"? Or the "leading role of Enver Hoxha..."? In the first instance I defy you to quote to me where I've preached the virtues of terrorism. In the second instance I defy you to show me where I've even mentioned Enver Hoxha. You're fine people to accuse others of misrepresentation!

Brian O'Riordan's letter is not even worth replying to. It's a collection of clichés that SAC hacks with a chip on their shoulder substitute for argument every time they have an opportunity to air their grudge.

Then again we can all get together and hash this out over tea and crumpets. What do you say, eh gang?

A LETTER TO THE REVIEW

Dear Sirs,

Last Wednesday I walked into the Varsity building to hand in an article. Turning into the Review office, I surprised fourteen people in the act of making love. They quickly jumped apart and acted like nothing had happened. I decided to do the same. However, I could not help but notice the attendant smell.

It was a detestable experience and has left a stigma in my memory. It was disgusting and it will probably be just as disgusting next Wednesday.

Yours truly,
Phillip Latio

Every Saturday night John and the boys get together to swap lurid photographs of their loved ones. "Trade you two of Aunt Julie for one in the UC washroom." For this and other theatre, turn to pages 6, 7 and 11.

Jon! you're so vain, you probably think this review is about you. Well, kinda. You'll never know if you turn to page 10. So turn to page 8 and read the review.

What famous Toronto artist paints portraits of opera singers on bowling balls? Here's a rare one of Lois Marshall done almost thirty years ago. She appeared in the flesh in T.O. last Saturday and we have a review of that auspicious occasion on page 9.

Harris' call of the wild: spiritual light from the North

If it weren't for the invention of the reaper-binder, Canada might be without Lawren Harris, the Group of Seven master. The affluence of his family, through success as Massey-Harris, was an essential factor in his art studies, enabling him to work under private tutors. And after all, where would Canada be without Lawren Harris?

An official tribute to Harris has been long overdue but the Art Gallery of Ontario's current exhibition of his Urban Scenes and Wilderness Landscapes has literally unseated anyone who's seen it. Only in a collection of this size (175 works, the latest from 1930) could the breadth of his talent be appreciated. In a word, it's breathtaking. It is by far the finest show of a Canadian artist in the AGO to date.

Harris' mystical vision of the "spirit of the land" was more weakly echoed in the works of his compatriots in the Group of Seven. His frequent trips to the Arctic, Algonquin Park, the north shore of Lake Superior and elsewhere often included A. Y. Jackson or Tom Thomson — but the most significant works emerging from these sketching trips were undeniably Harris's. Isolation Peak and Pic Island are two of his most powerful creations from the Canadian tours. They are examples of his foremost technique — the ability to isolate his subject in its sheer simplicity.

The occult, mysticism, and forms of Theosophy permeate Harris's paintings, especially the North Shore of Lake Superior series which dominates the exhibition. In his writings, Harris attributes the peculiar spacious style of the Group of Seven to a belief that "the top of the continent is a source of spiritual flow" which influences Canadians more strongly than Americans. This energizing force from the north, although bizarre as a philosophy, moved Harris to produce such abstract masterpieces as Lake Superior Hill XV and the Cloud series without which the exhibition would be considerably less powerful.

Lake Superior Hill XV uses round sweeping forms to soften the desolation and austerity of the landscape, and appears inviting. However, the sleek white rocks in the foreground are disarmingly similar to bleached bones, as if the world's skeleton were breaking through a stretched earth. It is this sort of mixture of impressions that Harris paintings strive to portray.

But wilderness landscapes weren't Harris's only major achievements. The AGO has amassed many of his finest urban scenes. Small houses, slums and row houses attracted the young painter as part of the urban wilderness. His training in Berlin (1904-7) has clearly influenced these paintings. Flat perspectives and outlines suggest a nearly overbearing allegiance to German Expressionist painters of the day. Houses, Richmond Street and Red House and Yellow Sleigh are two of the most highly regarded decorative paintings in the series. The urban scenes can't compare in power to the wilderness paintings, but they offer a more personal side of Harris for us to relish.

If Canadian national painting exists, it is buttressed by the work of Lawren Harris. The oohs and aahs of the opening night crowd spoke for a hard core gut response. They loved it. So will you.

The importance of being wild

Imagine an extrovert mixture of so-called serious music and rock concert, electric guitars and organ suitably amplified, all overlaid with a mild United Churchiness, and you have something of the flavour of David Fanshawe's African Sanctus, which, performed by the Festival Singers, Nexus and Soloist Roxolana Roslak, played to full houses last weekend at Metropolitan United Church.

African Sanctus is in part a record of a journey Fanshawe made in 1969 up the Nile from Cairo to Lake Victoria, and from the Red Sea in the east to the Marra Mountains in the west. But, as he made clear to the audience during an hour-long introductory talk accompanied by slides and impromptu dances, it also bears witness to a search for the one God: Christian, Islamic or pagan, while his wanderings began to assume the shape of a cross inscribed on Africa. All a bit much, you might think, for a Saturday night out, especially when the composer bounces on stage in safari garb and spirit cap, for all the world like an overgrown schoolboy or boy scout. He even did a passable imitation of Jomo Kenyatta. There was no denying that David is a natural; an original if not aboriginal; an eccentric with a naivety that disarms the critic.

So, I quietly suppressed any suspicions I might have had that Fanshawe was hyping himself or that his African road show and the promotion of his recording proved only that some holy fools are wiser than their audiences.

Of course, incorporating native idioms in the Mass is no new idea. Fanshawe does more than this. He employs his tapes from Africa as a skeleton on which to compose the parts of the Mass: thus Egyptian wedding music is juxtaposed with the Gloria, Muslim prayers with the Credo, and so on. Mixing his idioms has more than an exotic aim, and the elements of primitivism are not of the two-pence 'Caribbean' variety. By calling on a syncretism of sound experiences Fanshawe intends the work to evoke a kind of Identikit image of God, and of Man. One realizes after all how necessary was his talk from presenting us beforehand with the fragmentary and fragile reality through which African Sanctus works.

With an unregenerate like me it didn't wash, however. In fact it had the opposite effect. It made me reflect on Western music's fallen state, how it is no match for Africa. It's not every day that you get a 'Let the peoples sing' contest in which the Festival Singers, in spite of their customary virtuosity and purity of tone — or because of it — are basted by a refugee family escaped from the bush. And the music itself, for all its echoes of Palestrina, sounded like the watered down Anglicanism it was trying to avoid. After a particularly embarrassing 'Lord's Prayer', the aptest judgement came, I thought, from a Masai cow on tape (I was reminded of Sir Thomas Beecham's comment during a rehearsal of Aida when a camel misbehaved on stage: 'Not much of a musician, but gad, what a critic!'). That said, there were successful moments, as for instance the twice repeated Sanctus, which Elmer Iseler took more measured than the recording, allowing Nexus to achieve a powerful effect, or best of all, the blend of Kyrie and the Muezzin's call to prayer.

Still, the pantheist tune has been better played by Holst, the humanist by Tippett's mixing of negro spiritual and Beethoven. African Sanctus at least possesses the melancholy virtue of having stepped outside the decorum of ordinary musical performance so as to show it to be sham. But that Fanshawe's vision of 'a rock in the desert' only reflects "a bankruptcy of a whole tradition was a sob thought indeed. I went out and had a few

Short Eyes : prison retribution in NYC

On a recent trip to New York City, I saw Short Eyes after it had been hailed by critics as a master work at the New York film festival. It is a film that completely shook up my safe and comfortable view of life, and is not easily forgotten. One doesn't walk into a cinema, see this film, and come out the same person. It is so powerful, so devastating, and so rawly brutal, that it knocks the mental wind from you.

It is so visceral that the effect is like open heart surgery without an anesthetic. From the bowels of New York, life has never looked so terrifying.

Short Eyes is a visual and verbal depiction of the hellish life in a New York City prison, and the inclement events that take place when a "straight" middle class character, played by Bruce Davidson, is charged with raping a child and consequently thrown in the roughest cell block, known as the Tombs. Short Eyes, I should mention, is prison slang for child rapist. The atmosphere is of a volatile psychological balance. For the prisoners and the guard this is the vilest of crimes and they take their own form of retribution on him.

Short Eyes was written by Miguel Pinero, a playwright, who may well be the Jean Genet of the cinema. Pinero, who also stars in this film, wrote it on the basis of his experiences of life in prison. It is this sense of reality, or the way it is, that substantiates the fear. The film medium is allowed, to recreate Pinero's play and elevate it to a level of reality, where it becomes most effective because it is so credulous. The film is honest and makes no other claim. Theatrical conventions are used in this film, adding to the suspense. The drama closely resembles a Greek tragedy. The impact of the climax is tantamount to that of Oedipus Rex. It is gripping to watch.

The film was directed by Robert M. Young whose approach to filmmaking is documentary-oriented.

Clearly the film emphasizes the experiences of the prisoners rather than prison life. This creates in the film a compilation or series of experiences rather than a linear story. Among Young's work have been various NBC "White Paper" specials. Even Young's previous feature film Nothing But A Man (which he co-wrote and photographed), had the feel of a documentary.

"You don't have to love these people, but you do have to see them," Young asserts in a Village Voice interview. "I think we put things we can't face in hospitals, prisons, mental institutions." He added, "All these institutions are our subconscious."

The performance given by Bruce Davidson as a child molester is brilliant. It is both real and painful. The effect is ambivalent. We empathize with his tragic role yet are distanced by his moral depravity. The intense monologue he gives to a sympathetic inmate in which he confesses his "flash fever" obsession with young girls is mesmerizing. The acting is controlled while on the edge of hysteria.

Davidson was dinner for rats in Willard, and starred as Patrick in the film version of Mame. He also appears briefly as a World War II pilot released from a flying saucer in Close Encounters.

Most of the actors in Short Eyes are amateurs. Some of the people in the film have actually done time in the Tombs; a few have appeared in the play. Pinero turned down Hollywood and a lot of money because he wanted Puerto Ricans in the cast. The entire cast gives a powerfully convincing performance.

The language and ideas in Short Eyes may be considered offensive. After one cleans the dirt off the lens glass we only discover another, deeper layer. One is left with a dirty, black vision of man.

In my opinion, Short Eyes is the work of genius and points to a direction in the cinema which Hollywood has never undertaken. If you hesitate to hear about the cold facts of prison life and its inhuman barbarity then you better skip this one and see Close Encounters, instead.

No victories in this factory town

Although the Molson Ale clock on the wall of the Pointe Ste. Claire trucking pub has stopped, time has changed all. David Fenario's new play Nothing to Lose currently housed at the Toronto Free Theatre portrays the return of a successful playwright called Jerry from "Hogtown", where members of the CBC insist on going "on weird, faggoty power trips", back to the site of his former glory, a world of "hot" peanut machines which use "old dimes only", Brador Beer and hockey pinups. A world where "we (the truckers) always wait, and they (the administration) always win." Latent frustration embodies all. Actors edge about the stage throughout like lion cubs without food, kept too long inside their cages. The combined sense of immature hostility and adult disgruntlement joins together the various characters from without the safety of their separate tables.

The door bursts open. Jerry returns triumphant wearing sun glasses. "I'm a star of the silver screen," he exclaims. "Do you play hockey?" inquires the pub owner. Suddenly, Jerry becomes a soured celebrity. When he enthuses, "I'm making a living doing what I like, can't ask more than that" there is a sad scowl on his face. A scowl reminiscent of the one worn by Jackie, the star trucker. In the most moving section of the play, Jackie sits paralysed by repressed tears brokenly realizing "this is my life for the rest of my life and I don't like it." The common denominator of thwarted dreams provides the performance with the semblance of ensemble. The audience knows better than to expect any victories.

Guy Sprung's direction of Nothing to Lose is quietly clean, usefully employing every aspect of Barbra Matis's apt setting. However, it is Jean Archambault's stunning performance as Chabougamou, a singing drunk ("He would make a mint at the CBC. The Chabougamou SuperSpecial") that saves the play from its lulling middle section and occasional repetition. Archambault's skillful shakes and quivers, slouching posture, squelched voice and sliding gait echo the overall feeling of pathetic humor and futile chagrin magnificently.

Breakthrough: Potentiality from the cottage country

Bryan Wade knew, at first, as much about Tom Thomson as you or I. He knew of him as a painter, he knew of his remote and mysterious death on a Northern lake. At last he realized that Thomson was the stuff of Canadian legend. Bryan Wade decided that Thomson's life and art would be best explained in conjunction with a romantic love affair mixing primitive emotions and the temper of the times, the early days of the Great War.

Unfortunately, we still know as much as Bryan Wade. His portrait of Thomson's involvement with a vacationing English suffragette, first on a lake in Algonquin where he rescues her from drowning, and later in Rosedale, where he kept up a cabin, is simply a sketch wrapped up in the conceit of a psychological landscape. The idea is not a bad one, merely fuzzy.

Wade is widely regarded as one of the comers in Canadian theatre writing. His previous plays, principally This Side of the Rockies and Blitzkrieg, received favourable attention; but with Breakthrough, Wade has shown that he is willing to send an incomplete script out to be produced. As it now stands, it is a fragmented and unevocative portrait of the painter, and Frances Warren, the woman who fascinates him, is simply silly. Add to this a subplot which is over-rusticated and operates as a backwards-running deus ex machina, and you have a good idea — just one — which is insufficiently worked-out and overly fleshed-out.

The production standards are not as weak as the writing. When the script allows for some interaction of characters (as, for example, the top of the second act) the actors make a sprightly presentation of Thomson and fellow painters Arthur Lismer (a slightly vulgar British expatriate) and Lawren Harris (a visionary indeed) arguing politics and art with a leavening of romance. It is a true picture of the workings of the artist's mind while in the society of women.

Strong acting performances from hulking Richard Donat as Thomson, and Suzette Couture, his flame, apparently escaped from the calming influences of the Pankhursts, make the roles palatable but not likable. I felt sorry for Keith McNair, playing the moronic Fred Pond, for Wade had drawn the character so sketchily as to be impossible to play. Everyone remembers the violence, mindlessness of the class idiot. McNair had to convey both this and an astonishing rusticity and managed to give some of both. The minor roles were entertaining, and their acting competent, but the structure of the play did not call for them as an organic part of the whole.

Breakthrough is going to be a good play, but it hasn't yet been re-written. Until it is, don't spend the outrageous amounts the NDWT are charging to cover expenses. It is quite true that theatre is expensive, but I'd rather spend my money on pinball. Go to the Sunday matinee, pay what you feel like, and see why Bryan Wade's discovery of Thomson's interior landscape — an unbroken field of snow, potentiality in all directions — can someday be transformed into a metaphor which will provide the framework for an excellent Canadian play. See you there.

economy. He said Canada needs an industrial policy of concentrating on developing certain industries and processing maximum amounts of our resources at home. About the upcoming federal election he stated that as far as his party is concerned, "there is going to be one issue and one issue only, and that is jobs and the opportunity of young people to get employment."

After his remarks, Broadbent was questioned by a student panel.

In response to undergraduate student Ellen Adelberg's question concerning the responsibility of the university in job training, Broadbent said the university's role should be to "transmit culture and develop a critical mind," a remark which drew applause from the audience. He added that with a federal government committed to full employment, students could go to university for the "right" reason.

One member of the audience attacked Broadbent's criticisms of federal government policies, saying that Canadians are going to have to work harder and be less particular at a time when farm labor is being imported. Broadbent responded vociferously, saying of Trudeau "The nerve of that s.o.b., going around to the unemployed telling them they're lazy. Not only is he wrong but he's insulting!"

Joni Mitchell's vinyl analysis

In the most recent episode of her saga of self-analysis and all too rare self-discovery, Joni Mitchell has proclaimed herself Don Juan's Reckless Daughter, and has given that title to her tenth album. That statement of self is quite typical of Mitchell. Actually, though, she began recognizing her own deepest roots only as recently as her last album, Hejira. Before that, Mitchell played (and still is playing) several roles in popular music: the dove-pushers' eternal spokeswoman (on the cover of the new album, there are doves flying out of her "heart"), the collective female heart and mind, and, later, as she began to dedicate herself a little more to causes other than herself and her current lover, a critic of marriage, home ownership and general materialism.

Don Juan's Reckless Daughter, a double album, exploits the nostalgic themes of Hejira and resumes the cynicism and satire of The Hissing of Summer Lawns. Mitchell is watching her life evolve. In "Paprika Plains", she links her present with her distant past, describing Indians as seen from the air: "I'm low in a helicopter—And the wind from whirling blades—Flaps their woven blankets—And flags their raven braids." The expressive power of juxtaposition is that simple. "Dreamland" picks up the same theme, with Mitchell contrasting her Canadian background and her American destiny: "On a plane flying back to winter—In shoes full of tropic sand—A lady in a foreign flag—On the arm of her Marlboro Man." And she does make it seem like her inevitable destiny—her unexpected fame and fortune make the past almost mythical. Furthermore, her myth tries to explain how the rest of the world fits into her life; this is done by dropping names of the past and of the present: Charlie Chaplin, Ingmar Bergman, Pine-Sol, and "Willy the Shake".

Of course, love themes still dominate. "Jericho", previously recorded on Miles of Aisles (Mitchell's live album), is offered again, somewhat polished. Unfaithful and unresponsive men still pepper her woeful existence, as we're told in "Off Night Backstreet", "The Silky Veils of Ardor" (which is a sort of working-over of the traditional folk song "Come All Ye Fair and Tender Maidens") and "Talk to Me". Joni Mitchell is never apart from her love lyrics, or, for that matter, any of her lyrics.

Musically, Joni Mitchell experiments with Latin rhythms and harmonies, as well as with elaborate orchestration. Her drummer is (former?) boyfriend John Guerin and her bassist is Jaco Pastorius. On vocal harmonies, Mitchell is assisted by Chaka Khan of Rufus and John David Souther. There is one instrumental, "The Tenth World"—that's new for Mitchell—but it's still mostly the delicately balanced wedding of lyrics and melodies that creates the uncanny atmosphere of Mitchell's songs. Over-all sound is quite good, considerably better than that of Hejira, which received an extremely poor pressing.

Terrific. We're all glad to hear that Joni Mitchell is finally getting it all together. I think, too, though, that a lot of us miss the kinds of songs we could sing along to, in every sense. Songs like "Both Sides Now" and "The Circle Game", which were poignant but not pandering. Joni Mitchell has always written about herself, but she usually managed to disguise that fact by letting her audience participate and by delivering her message with a degree of lyrical refinement. Now we have to abstract from the details of her own life, since her songs have increasingly become mini-autobiographies. Those details make her lyrics seem careless and unplanned, though they're still more literate than those of, say, Dan Hill.

It's almost tempting to ask: if Don Juan's Reckless Daughter were Joni Mitchell's first release, how would it be received? Personally, I respect her creative talents largely on the basis of her past performance. That's not to say that Mitchell can't be enjoyed anymore; it's just that she's become something of an acquired taste.

Volpone no phony

The trend toward local theatre seems to be satire, with the recent production of Sheridan's The Critic, the upcoming Moliere play, The Imaginary Invalid, and, more immediately, the Drama Center's version of Volpone by Ben Jonson which opened at Hart House last night.

Although Jonson was writing during the early part of the 17th century, his work is certainly accessible to modern audiences. Comedy based on human nature remains perennially attractive and Jonson exploits his knowledge of the wiles of mankind in this play subtitled The Fox.

The play centres around Volpone, a Renaissance con artist (played by David Parry), who delights and disgusts as he weaves an incredible web of intrigue, accompanied by the antics of a hermaphrodite, a dwarf, a eunuch, two whores and various other unusual types.

In addition to fascinating plot and characters, hand painted costumes and a re-creation of Venice's streets, director Leon Rubin attests to the fact that the production has something for everyone, ranging "from subtle classical allusions to cheap sexual innuendo". If you've just finished Machiavelli, or missed the latest Monty Python movie, Volpone may fill your needs. It runs through this weekend, and next week from Tuesday to Saturday.

DO YOU NEED A WILL?

Marie Huxter, Assistant Dean at the Faculty of Law, announces a clinical training programme in will drafting. Members of the university community—academic and administrative staff, students and their spouses—interested in having a simple will prepared, should contact Ms. Huxter at 978-4908. Those interested will be accepted on a "first-come, first-served" basis. There will be no charge involved. The interview will be conducted and the will prepared by a practising lawyer. A small number of students (approximately 5) will sit in on the interviews between lawyers and clients. Two attendances will be required and will be scheduled at 8:00 a.m., 5:00 p.m. or 6:00 p.m. The first attendance will be during the week of January 30 or February 6 and the second will be two weeks later.

The Faculty of Law cannot undertake to supply complex estate planning advice in this programme. Should it appear that the particular circumstances of those who wish to participate involve advice of a greater sophistication than the programme can offer, they will be advised by the lawyer in charge of the programme.

Mozart wanders in the frozen Northern wasteland

Mixed bag saved by dignity & humour

The third concert of the Northstars Mozart series was truly a mixed bag of the composer's works, ranging from early to late compositions, both sacred and secular. While the overall effect was favourable, one felt tempted to paraphrase an oft-quoted line: 'when it was good, it was very, very good, and when it was bad, it was boring'.

The first striking feature about Saturday's concert was the change in Lister Sinclair's commentary. Unlike the two previous concerts, in which he served only as an annoying interruption with his mindless chatter, it appeared that this time he had actually considered quite seriously what he was going to say. His words were supported by quotations from letters of the day and his delivery of the text translations for the songs was tempered by a fine sense of humour. Consequently, one of the major obstacles to one's enjoyment of this series has been removed. Let's just hope it continues this way.

As for the music itself, the selection was so varied that inconsistency in quality was inevitable. Most outstanding was Rosemarie Landry's interpretation of "Die Ihr des Unermesslichen Weltalls" (K. 619), presented with all the dignity and intensity befitting this late Masonic work. At the opposite end of the scale stood the twelve Duets for two wind instruments (K. 487), the greatest contributors to the tedious side of the evening.

The Missa Brevis (K. 115), which opened the program, did not really add anything to this series, even though it was adequately performed. With such a prolific composer as Mozart, there is no need to include works written in a style so obviously not his own. The singers — Landry, Janet Stubbs, Marc Dubois and Joel Katz — appeared uncomfortable with it and the occasional predominance of Katz's voice was more a fault of the overly reserved singing of the others. Similarly, the four Canons which followed displayed numerous weak entries and Dubois seemed unusually restrained.

The ensemble singing came into its own only in the second half of the concert. The combination of Landry, Stubbs and Katz from the Six Nottumi was delightful and well balanced, but the last two Nottumi might have been omitted at no great loss. Even more successful was the closing number, the comic trio "Liebes Mandel, Wo Is's Bandel" (K. 441), sung by Landry, Dubois and Katz. Thankfully, Dubois lost his earlier reticence and all three performed with convincing enthusiasm. Of course, the good humour of the last number ensured a strong audience appreciation, though the evening generally tended to be overly sombre and, consequently, somewhat oppressive.

I found Lois Marshall's interpretation of seven lieder disappointing. Emotionally, her performance was quite rich, but her style was too heavy and overbearing. Greta Kraus' accompaniments, for these lieder as for her two numbers in the second half of the program, were ideal and provided some truly joyous moments.

Copeland dynamic

Tuesday evening, Philadelphia born singer and songwriter Beverly Glenn Copeland returned to the Riverboat for a standard five night engagement to Sat. night. Once again I found myself part of an audience that was astounded by her talent for songwriting and tremendously moved by her singing and playing abilities.

She accompanies herself on keyboards with a very soulful, almost gospel piano style. Her supportive accompaniments are noticeable for their incessant repetitions of captivating rhythmic figures, and her contrasts between loud and soft playing. On this particular occasion she alternated between an upright acoustic piano and an electric piano. The accompaniments on the electric piano were less effective because this particular instrument was very limited in tone quality.

The music and lyrics build from her very lowest vocal notes to a feverish and frenzied sound in her higher register. You hear everything vocally from the sound of a classical soprano to the growl of a blues singer. She takes you through her own personal experiences to peaks of emotion and yet always restrains herself a little, never pushing her voice too far. Choruses build higher and higher as she becomes more and more emotional with her song.

Whether it is the unforgettable refrain of "Sweet Hands of Time", the emotion of "Won't You Come Love Me", or the clever irony of "Welcome to this World — where it's so hard to get things to come easy", the songs are as good as anything you can hear today, and her performance of them is an uplifting experience. Honesty, sensitivity, subtlety, and a bit of humour between songs make it all quite irresistible.

A sentimental pot-boiler springs out from Trinity

Would you like to hear a truism? Romeo and Juliet is a play which, however marvellous its language, soon becomes tedious if re-read. It is a sentimental pot-boiler, and is recognized to be such by audiences who are not bard-struck. A second truism? That the play's life dies with Mercutio, and his roistering wit is the appetizer to a gourmand's repast of blind folly and sheer pig-headedness displayed by our 'star-crossed' lovers. At the recent Trinity College Drama Society presentation of the play, both these truisms were bandied about between acts but had retired to books of literary criticism by the end of the performance.

For, in fact, this truncated version of the old faithful had kept its audience enthralled by quick pacing, the abrupt juxtaposition of stage business and serious speech, and a bellyful of good stage fights. Director Reed Needles, who played Mercutio with enough aplomb to almost unseat his play's balance, deserves commendation for a well-thought out, concise, and sprightly production.

His eye is keen when dealing with appearances, but unfortunately, as much as his cast looked the part of young Veronese sparks, they were not always able to flesh out the appearance. In particular, Michael Zeitlin as Romeo, was the personification of languor but could scarcely be heard. His companion Benvolio was similarly soft-spoken (Michael Obal). On the other hand, Juliet, played with authority by Corinne Pever, spoke well and clearly.

The joint creations of director and actors were finely drawn in many cases. Ted Byers presented an immensely amusing Paris, a fop and remarkably dull, Tybalt was lovingly recreated by Chris Grove as a bravo, and old Capulet, corpulently, and with rather broad humour, by Charles McMulkin. With a typically difficult part, that of the statesman, Richard Bronskill achieved the required dignity and variety to redeem a typically stuffy Shakespearean role.

Several characters were developed to a high level of creativity. Needles' Mercutio was not the charming personality so often portrayed, but rather more of a trouble-maker — morally ambiguous clown. Friar Lawrence, often played as a doddering idiot, was played with energy and fire by Graham Yost, and Juliet's Nurse was an extraordinarily amusing creation of Sue McSherry.

After so long a catalogue of names what is left to add? The musical bridges of Les Barca were moody, useful contrivances to set a scene or cover the delays in the setting. The ensemble played crisply, or so it seemed, for they were in Seeley Hall, the nadir of acoustics. Special mention to David Beattie who gave a warm-voiced interlude.

Romeo and Juliet was good theatre, as was Needles' previous attempt at Shakespeare last year. It is classical theatre for the masses, honey-coated in stage business and sword-fights, but it has integrity. The technical staff of the TCDS are coming up to standard, and more ambitious ventures should soon be forthcoming. The extras remain, as they always do in campus productions wherever they are, recognizably being 'broken-in', finding their way about on stage for the first few times; but this production was well-designed and a worthy accomplishment.

Neil Young; "10 years & I still can't sing"

It's hard to name another person who can't really sing, can't write and can't play guitar, that has been making records longer than Neil Young. One would think that Neil, a card carrying sixties burnout, a Canadian folkie with arthritis and such a bad list of credentials, would produce even worse albums than such 'sensitive' balladeers as Bim and Dan Hill. Decade shows how Neil Young has continuously triumphed in spite of these odds.

Dan Hill is so wholesome (and so stupid) that he could be a high school guidance counselor; Neil sings from the other end of the suicide prevention line. For though he has written his share of harmless love songs ("I Believe in You", "Heart of Gold" and others on this retrospective album), it is the prevailing atmosphere of terminal desperation and a lack of "professionalism" that has alienated the suburban Janis Ian as well as supposed connoisseurs of progressive music such as ELP fans, from Neil's music. This album restates something that few of this latter group of people know which is of Young's use of orchestral arrangements and multi-tracking while still a member of the Buffalo Springfield. He recounts, in the fascinating liner notes to this album, that in 1966 "I overbudded my vocals line by line... I took over 100 takes to get it." If you're a technocrat you might grudgingly respect this early part of Young's work (the first side of "Decade") but will probably regard the other five sides of this album as raucous caterwaulings. But, if for you, music is something more than elaborate finger exercises, they can be seen as the history of his pursuit of emotional honesty and musical directness. Songs such as "Cortez the Killer" and "Ohio" express outrage and indignation better than a lot of 'punk rock' songs do, while "Long May You Run" is cheery without being cloying.

Neil's integrity as an artist is confirmed with his comment on the 1972 hit single "Heart of Gold". "This song put me in the middle of the road. Travelling there soon became a bore so I headed for the ditch. A rougher ride but I saw more interesting people there." He also claims that the sparse "Tonight's the Night" is his best album, even though it is the one that sold the least.

The album contains the best of Neil Young's guitar blitzes (sic), five good previously unreleased songs and lots of wry wit.

The solidity of the music on these discs attests to the fact that Neil is capable of writing excellent songs. It can be said of "Decade" that it has few, if any, weak moments, unlike most other triple albums in rock.

Davis invokes Edwardiana

The Edwardian era will never die as long as Andrew Davis is in possession of a conductor's podium. This statement is not, take note, offered as a criticism in any way, quite the reverse in fact. Davis knows his element and when he is in it, the results are sublime.

Tuesday's concert began with the Roman Carnival Overture by Berlioz. The essential thing to listen for in this work, which all too often sounds like a crashing nothing, is the melodic aspect. The composition is based on themes, tunes if one is vulgar, from Berlioz' opera Benvenuto Cellini. Most conductors ignore that fact, and I didn't realize how the music should be played until I heard the recording made by Arthur Nikisch, the premier conductor in the Edwardian age. Davis' treatment of the work was straight from Queen's Hall, 1910, and it was outstanding.

Two Sketches Based on French Canadian Airs by Sir Ernest MacMillan originally dedicated to the Hart House String Quartet, was later re-worked for string orchestra. The light dynamic shading which Davis demanded throughout the concert was heard to a great advantage here. Davis has obviously been working with the lower strings and their solo passage in the second sketch was exemplary in terms of unity and melodic expression. The composition itself is an indication of 1927 English Canadian music, namely, our feet may have been in Mimico, but our hearts, creatively speaking, were in England. The second sketch, for example sounded amazingly like early Benjamin Britten, but of course no such influence was possible, chronologically speaking. The whole situation becomes rather ironic — we reach French Canada via Westminster Bridge.

Knaben Wunderhorn. Only one criticism can be offered; namely the balance between soloist and orchestra wasn't ideal. The most satisfactory song was "Wo die schonenen Trompoten blasen". The supernatural theme was conveyed by Forrester's ability as a vocal colourist; it is a valuable talent. Forrester's interpretations were uniformly outstanding, except "Verlorne Muh" in which I felt that there was too much striving for the effect of coy lovers, but then reviewers are a cerebral lot.

Finally, with the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4, we were back in Davis' home preserve. The rhythmic control was a revelation. As in the case of the Berlioz, one gets used to hearing aural mush in terms of the details of the score, but Davis clears the sludge. For example, the triple-meter section of the first movement sounded as such, counter rhythms which usually remain buried reared their interesting heads, and so forth. The pizzicato passages in the third movement were within an inch of being perfect. And for once the brass, especially the trumpets played like members of a major orchestra, rather than extras in the Newmarket Citizens Band. One could go on, but it was the light hand which Davis used at the same time evoking an effective dynamic range that made the performance outstanding. Often friends who aren't taken by classical music can be amazingly astute. If a performance reaches them, you know that you have glimpsed the realm of the spheres. After the Tchaikovsky, a non-musical friend turned to me with wide eyes and said "Ever neat!" He was right, it was, and should do Toronto proud on the China tour.

Tonight's repeat of the TSO China tour preview (see today's review) regrettably clashes with the U of T Symphony in Walter Hall. The latter program includes Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis (Feldbrill did that composer's "Mathis" with the TSO only a few weeks ago), Debussy's familiar Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, and Tchaikovsky's less familiar tone poem Francesca da Rimini. Concertos programmed are Mozart's Second Horn and Weber's First Clarinet Horn and Ronald George and Daniel Sutherland respectively. Considerable variety for an inconsiderable $1.50.

Also tonight, American baritone Richard Stilwell sings a recital of Schumann (Dichterliebe), Duparc, Ravel, Barber, and Ives. $5.50 and $6.50 at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Tomorrow evening the McGill Wind Ensemble offers a free concert of light numbers in the MacMillan Theatre, while guitarist Alan Torok plays in the St. Lawrence along with accordionist Joseph Macerollo ($5 and $6). The major Saturday event is pianist Anton Kuerti in Massey Hall. Program includes Beethoven's Sonata Op. 14, No. 2, Schumann's Carnival, Grieg, Mendelssohn, and Scriabin's Op. 8 Etudes. Tickets start at a reasonable $3.50.

The Hart House Sunday Evening Concert features the Tapestry Singers in a program that suits their name — Monteverdi, Poulenc, Copland, Ravel, you name it. Starts at 8:00, free tickets from the Porter's desk. The Opera in Concert people present Mozart's Clemenza di Tito Sunday at 3:00 and Monday at 8:00. St. Lawrence Centre; tickets are cheaper for the matinee. The North York Symphony plays in Seneca's Minkler Aud. Sunday and Monday at eight; Brahms's First, Irving Glick's Lamentations for Quartet and Orchestra (with the Cacelia Quartet).

The most embarrassing shortcoming of music in Toronto is the scarcity of visiting orchestras. The TSO's China tour opens the door to Buffalo this Tuesday and Wednesday. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Ives, Bartok and Tchaikovsky's Fifth, in Massey Hall.

The Thursday Afternoon Series in Walter Hall features an interesting program of folk songs scored for chamber ensemble. Free at 2:10. American cellist Linda Alle plays in St. Lawrence Centre Thursday evening at 8:00. Students $3.

Friday: The Revue is still alive and so is Jonah, Who Will Be 25 In The Year 2000 which probably will be running at one theatre or another in this city until May of that year. The Revue has it all week. The plot does not concern the plight of a child prophet whose hopes of becoming a martyr to Greenpeace are lighted by his being born in landlocked Switzerland, but it should. The New Yorker is also starting a long run, this time of a film which has never shown in Toronto, Sebastiane. The film concerns the martyrdom of the patron saint of male homosexuals if you don't believe me just take a look at the Renaissance representations of the death — if those arrows aren't longer than they are around, I'll go back to mushroom farming). It also has the distinction of being in Latin with English subtitles and having a soundtrack by Brian Eno. Also troubling itself with the problems of young men, power and death is Lewis Milestone's All Quiet on the Western Front at the Science Centre. In a more populist vein U of T Films promises hours of motionless boredom with Kubrick's tour through the entire of Gainsborough's works (a.k.a. Barry Lyndon) while Cinema Gratis proffers God in a monolith with 2001 (at Scar. tonight and Med. Sci. tomorrow). And, in case any of us thought that we'd get free from the non-stop Wertmuller fest, and from the insults I can't hold back, Cinema Lumiere comes through to play Dutchboy in the dike with a week-long double-bill of The Seduction of Mimi and (as a come on of sorts) Fellini's Amarcord.

Saturday: Cinema Beach, now working out of Innis Town Hall has a pair of Chaplin chestnuts: The Great Dictator and Modern Times. Otherwise all is quiet here front and back.

Sunday: The AGO wakes up well before its expected date with the groundhog and begins its Berlin Now series with Top Hat, the Confessions of a Happy Idler and Far From Home. Regus Films and Innis have cartoons at 2:00 and 4:30 and Metropolis at 7:30.

Monday: No change nowhere.

Tuesday: The Science Centre continues to amaze and delight. For this evening they've found Klaus Kirschner's Mozart (a childhood chronicle). It's one of those films which critics always employ as a comparison, in order to show how badly done are most movie biographies. It's almost four hours long though, so bring a pillow.

Wednesday: The Science Centre's German series offers Zum Essen Braucht Man Ein Besteck (You Can't Eat Without a Set of Cutlery) which relates the difficulties of a mixed marriage in a world without meat tenderizer. OISE, meanwhile, has three films from Africa. Black Girl and Borom Sarrett are by Ousmane Sembene, who is generally regarded as Africa's most interesting filmmaker. Sambizanga (by Sara Maldoror) is a political film made in pre-independence Angola.

Thursday: OISE turns about and shows two films about survivors Orson Welles' F for Fake a fitting homage to the master art forger Elmyr de Hory, and the Alec Guinness wonder The Horse's Mouth. The Science Centre closes out the week with Franz Seitz's adaptation of the Thomas Mann Story Unordnung und Frühes Leid (Disorder and Early Torment) which centres on the conscience of an historian who is reconsidering a work of nationalist puffery he wrote in his youth.

The big news of the week is that Ted "Petrucci" Nugent is at the Gardens on Feb. 14th. The opening band is Golden Earring and tickets went on sale last night. One word of warning: no one plays louder than Nugent, so bring something to shove into your ears.

Aside from that, things are moving slow. ELP is giving two shows (Christ) on Feb. 2nd and 3rd. Local hard-rock-Rush-lookalikes, Triumph are giving their first headline show at Massey on the 17th. And to think you could have seen them at Dr. Johns two weeks ago. Barde will be at Con. Hall on the 26th of this month. In the more progressive line, Henry Kalser and John Oswald will be at the Music Gallery tomorrow night. They'll be followed by Yves Boulianne on Sunday night.

At the ol' drinking establishments, Melean and Melean bring their wry and whimsical sense of humour to the El Mocambo tonight. Pockets is at the Gasworks, Offenbach is at the Colonial, Richard Kleelan is at the Groaning Board, Beverly Glen-Copeland (see today's review) is at the Riverboat and Small Change is at the Horseshoe, Octavian at Dr. John's (U.C. Refectory).

In the hot tips department, Rough Trade is bracing up Carol Pope and guitarist Staples are going to carry on the light themselves. Good luck kids. paul

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans! A word from Dave Caplan, manager of Yellowfingers: The club will definitely re-open for jazz entertainment at the beginning of March. The extensive renovations will result in a complete glass enclosure and hopefully entice back the club's lost business. Good luck Dave.

Stop 33 at the Sutton Place, Bay at Wellesley, has initiated a Saturday afternoon jazz policy. Tomorrow, the Kathryn Moses Quartet (flute) featuring Hagood Hardy. 3-6 p.m. $3 cover. Kathy will also perform Monday at 8 p.m. at the Science Centre, free with admission.

At Bourbon St., trumpeter Ruby Braff blows until the 21st, followed for a week by the sax and flute of Eddie Daniels.

Ed Bickert plays tonight and tomorrow at George's, with superb saxophonist Eugene Amaro coming in on Monday for his gig.

Cafe May, 396 Roncesvalles, features the Lorne Lofsky Trio (guitar) Sunday each week, 7:30-11 p.m.

The Pat Clemence Jazz Band plays after hours this weekend at Cafe Soho. The club will also present An Afternoon of Blues Music featuring Charney Guttel on Jan. 21, 22, 28 & 29, from 2-4 p.m.

Tomorrow at 9 p.m., the Music Gallery presents Henry Kalser and John Oswald and their saxophone-guitar improvisations.

This Wednesday the Fred Stone Frazz Nonet will perform a noon-hour concert of free jazz in the Concert Hall at the Royal Conservatory of Music. Mario Romano on piano is excellent. Free admission!

Starting today, this column will selectively list Dixieland groups in the city. The Brunswick Hotel features Dr. McJazz weekly. John Arpin plays ragtime piano weekdays 9 p.m.-1 a.m. at the Chelsea Inn, 33 Gerrard W. Sunday at 7:30 p.m. finds the Silverleaf Jazz Band in the Brigantine Room at Harbourfront. Admission $1. For information, call 364-5665. Catch the Louisiana Joymakers at Grossman's on Spadina.

art

Shows this week range from art for the smart (Andrew Smith's Naked Clothing at the Isaacs Gallery), to art for the heart (Lawren Harris's gala at the Art Gallery of Ontario). Smith's technique of pressing clothing between layers of pulp and allowing it to dry has severely diminished his wardrobe. The Lawren Harris show is simply the best thing you have seen or will see in the next century. Till Feb. 26.

An exhibition of 19th century Canadian watercolour paintings is running neck to neck with the ever-popular British watercolour masters of the 19th century at the AGO. Will Constable, Turner, and Blake stump Way, Creswell, and Fowler for the Canadians? Till Feb. 19 and Feb. 12.

Also at the AGO works by Video artists and Glimpses at the sordid aspects of Nightlife by photographer Michael Mitchell. Till Feb. 26 and 19. These shows are perhaps better places to catch a snooze away from the

Hart House Art Market Seminar Series continues this week with a discussion of the how-to's of private collecting. The speakers are Mr. and Mrs. Harry Jackman, at 7 p.m. in the Bickersteth Room at Hart House. Downstairs, you'll find the paintings and drawings of Mimi Matte till Jan. 27.

Also around the campus, New College has shifted feet and is presenting an exhibition of Native Canadian Art, on loan from the living rooms and dens of U of T professors. Till Jan. 20 in the Ivey Library. Scarborough College is exhibiting a rare collection of medieval Islamic textiles and artifacts from the ROM till Feb. 13.

Whatever happened to student art shows? They're few and far between but Harbourfront's display called Stimulus '78 includes work by local artists, assisted by funds from the Ontario Arts Council. The point of the show is to prove what can be done when local talent is prevented from migrating to the great cultural coliseum to the south. Till Feb. 12.

A brief listing, alphabetically by company. But first, on campus this week, at 2:15 today, last performance of Mrozek's dark Out at Sea, at the Erindale College Studio Theatre. Seventy-five cents for Erindalians, $1 for mere mortals. At Hart House, Johnson's Volpone cadges its way across the boards. Call 978-8668 for reservations. At the Bathurst St. Theatre, 25 Lennox, the NDWT Co. is premiering Bryan Wade's "fictional romance" of Tom Thomson, called Breakthrough. It certainly isn't for Wade, whose text doesn't make things easy for the actors involved, but it continues this weekend, tonight at 8:30, tomorrow at 5:30 and 9:30 and a PWYC matinee — recommended — at 2:30 on Sunday. At the O'Keefe, Two Faces of Africa, from producers who should know better. Monday to Saturday at 8:30, two o'clock matinees Wednesday and Saturday. Call 366-8484.

The Phoenix Theatre rejoins our listings with their production of Pinter's Old Times which previews Tuesday and Wednesday next week and opens the following night. For those three evenings, the eight o'clock curtain will cost you a mere dollar, thenceforth, the cost will be $3 for students, or PWYC at the 3:00 Sunday matinees. Call 922-7835 for information or go to 390 Dupont St. At the Royal Alex, Neil Simon's California Suite continues; call 363-4211; at the Fairview Library Theatre, Stage Centre Productions give us Sheridan's School for Scandal tonight and tomorrow's at 8:30 and Sunday at 3 p.m.; call 497-2482. Sorry, Scarborough Theatre Guild, operating out of Playhouse 66, 66 Denton Avenue, present the Patrick Hamilton script Angel Street (released as a movie titled Gas Light in the 40's). 8:30 curtain Friday and Saturday, 7:30 on Sunday. Call 751-6509 for reservations and prices.

At the Tarragon, Tremblay's St. Carmen of the Main runs from Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30, Sunday matinee at 2:30. You will definitely need reservations for this one. Call 531-1827. Toronto Arts Productions are taking dead aim at their next-door competition with Slzwe Banal Is Dead, a South African play from someone who does know better. Running Mondays to Saturdays at 8:00 p.m. and Saturday 2 p.m. matinee. Call 366-7723. Toronto Truck Theatre presents an amusing but uneven Moliere, The Imaginary Invalld, at the Colonnade and the revenue-generating Mousetrap at their Belmont St. location. Call 922-0084 for further information.

Toronto Free Theatre starts Erika Ritter's Splits with previews the 23rd and 24th, PWYC, at their upstairs space, 26 Berkeley St. Their season is in a little disarray, so you might check for details at 368-7601. It's probably my filing system that's in disarray... Toronto Workshop is having, indeed, a champagne season. The Club is enjoying an extended run until Feb. 18; Tuesday to Sunday, shows at 8:30 — but Saturdays, 6 and 9 and Sundays 2:30 at 12 Alexander Street. Meanwhile, their next attraction, David Fennario's Nothing To Lose, is occupying the downstairs at TFT on Berkeley St. Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30, Sunday matinee at 2:30. Try the TWP number for info, then TFT. And the Young People's Theatre is presenting a Lanterna Magica production, The Lost Fairy Tale. Odd times and an odd show. Call 864-9732 for details.

A few reviews: watch for John Herbert to appear at the Poor Alex next week; Second City, Once More With Feeling (363-1674); Studio Cabaret, Starting Here, Starting Now (924-6635); Teller's Cage, I'll Tell You Mine... If You'll Tell Me Yours (cute, yeah? 862-1434); Theatre in the Dell, Sweet City Lights (598-4802); and a European cabaret tradition, Jiri Schubert's Marlene, Marlene (961-2467).

And I have received an interesting notice recommending that I drop in at the Nervous Breakdown Coffee House, 200 Carlton St., Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday any week to see a mixture of music, mime, theatre and even poetry. If you're interested in performing there, call 690-8038. I also note that A Space is presenting the Hummer Sisters' The Bible As Told To Karen Ann Quinlan on weekends at A Space, 85 St. Nicholas St. Weird? Sure is.

Ballet Ys is at St. Paul's Centre tonight at 8 p.m. with four new works and one old composition. Contemporary ballet is mixed with modern dance, classical music combines with rock. Also tomorrow night and January 26-28. There's a reduced student admission of $3. Adults $4.50. Three blocks north of Bloor St. at 121 Avenue Road. Information: 364-3428.

The National Ballet of Canada will be at O'Keefe Centre February 8 through March 11. The season sees the return of Principal dancer Veronica Tennant after a year's absence; Tomas Schramek dances Prince Florindum in The Sleeping Beauty for the first time and another premiere is that of Karen Kain as Lady Capulet in Romeo and Juliet. Last but certainly not least is the Canadian premiere of Frederick Ashton's The Dream. Feb. 15 is gala fund-raising night.

Brochures detailing the schedule, casting and prices are available at regular ticket outlets, O'Keefe Centre Box Office, or failing this, check the National's ads in the local dailies.

Radio Varsity is now booming out every Monday through Friday from 9:30 to 11:00 through speakers in the UC Refectory, the JCR, various SAC buildings, Whitney Hall common rooms and the Hart House Truck Shop.

News, Weather and Sports broadcast three times each day at 12:30, 3:30 and 6:30. After the News at 12:30 and 6:30 our Special Features dept. rolls into action with The Beatles Story on Mondays and Original and Golden Age radio drama each Tuesday and with a Newsmagazine on Thursday. Good music at other times. And that's a four-rouger, good buddy. Catch ya on the flip flop.

Hockey Play-Off Battle Wages

By ELAINE FRET

Last Wednesday night the Lady Blues took to the ice to play their cross town rivals from York. In a game which exhibited "good balance, good depth and great enthusiasm", according to coach Dave McMaster, the Ladies took a 7-1 victory. McMaster felt that his team took control of most of the game, with the help of very steady net minding from Mary Garland, who faced 27 shots on goal. Toronto tallied 33 shots on net throughout the night, with Val Busch's proving to be the most lethal.

Accompanying Busch's hat trick were singles by Betty Cook, Maureen Mitchell, Cathy Brown and Noreen Lem. Also appearing repeatedly on the stats sheet was veteran Linda Harley, who collected four assists. Dianne Wardrope also anchored the defence by her outstanding stick handling and incredible manoeuvring. On repeated occasions she stopped York's offensive drives.

The Ladies now have a short period of rest until next week when they will hit the road twice. Tuesday, January 24, the team will travel to Guelph, where they will be greeted by their closest nemesis. Currently, Guelph has seven points, while the Ladies are close behind with five. Certainly this will be a contest then, which could determine the team's playoff chances, at a later date. According to McMaster, none of the teams are truly out of it yet and McMaster is the only team assured of a final spot.

Thursday the team will descend upon York in hopes of grabbing yet another two points. While McMaster is far out in front in the divisional race, Toronto may still have a chance of catching them, if they keep up the style of hockey they have been playing. There is no doubt, at all that the all important desire to win is certainly present.

Women's ice hockey is becoming more and more popular in Canada in proportion to the improvement in the skill level of those playing the sport. The lack of checking does nothing to detract from the beauty of the game and spectators are assured of a satisfying evening's entertainment.

Hey You!

Why is this girl running through the woods? She is coming to the Varsity office with her copy, of course. Unfortunately, only a very few people are following her example these days, and as a result the women's sports pages are not as informative or as impressive as they should be.

Come on women, perhaps you have hidden talent, but who will ever know unless you give it a try. Leave your name at the Varsity office and you will be contacted. Writers and photographers are both in sore demand — and this editor can't keep going without any assistance.

Thanks to date go to: Jeanne Gray (brilliant writing), Sue Langley, Regina Hicki-Szabo, Sheryn Posen, Maria Kalin, Barb Grochowski, Sandy Grant, Cheryl Housely and Barb Paluch. If you've written once, why not write again and if you've never written... the time has come!

Ryerson No Match For Basketball Blues

By JIM O'LEARY

The Basketball Blues had no trouble dumping the Ryerson Rams 83-51 in a game played at the Benson Building Wednesday night.

The game was anything but a classic as both teams played erratically, shooting and passing inconsistently. Give-aways were the order of the game with Ryerson playing especially sloppily in their own end.

The Blues jumped into an early 8-0 lead and looked as if they were going to run away with the game in the opening minutes. They quickly cooled off however as errant passes spoiled several scoring opportunities.

Despite leading 48-36 at the half, Toronto coach John McManus was not pleased with their play. "We're not playing very well. We look sloppy," McManus lamented as the teams headed for the dressing rooms at half time.

Luckily for the Blues the stats didn't reveal their bad start. They shot 44 per cent and had their fast break working effectively throughout the half. Against a tougher opponent however, they probably would not have jumped into the lead.

The Blues settled down a bit in the second half and took control of the game. Superb defence coupled with terrible shooting by Ryerson limited the Rams to only 15 points in the second half.

The Rams hit on only six of the 46 shots they attempted for an unbelievably low 13 per cent. This led McManus to comment "we've had some pretty bad nights but never that bad."

The Rams' inability to score was due largely to the presence of Randy

Cook who was positioned under the basket for most of the game. He controlled the backboards, snatching 21 rebounds, and stopped the Rams from shooting from inside. They were forced to shoot from far out without success.

Cook also turned in a sparkling offensive performance, collecting a game high 27 points. He was the only player on either side to play the whole game. McManus says "I would like him (Cook) to win the rebounding title so I leave him in as much as possible. He is big and strong and paces himself pretty well so it's not too hard for him to play the whole game."

Other Blues' scorers to hit double figures were guards Doug Fox with 12 and Tim McGhie with 10 points. The remainder of the points were distributed among the rest of the team. As is always the case McManus used every one of his players.

The Rams' leading scorer was Dave Fogolin, who was held to 14 points. Fogolin led the league in scoring last year but was more than adequately handled by Cook on Wednesday.

The Blues travel to London tomorrow to meet the Western Mustangs in an exhibition game. This game is in preparation for their very important meeting with Carleton next Friday. If the Blues are to make the playoffs, a good showing at Carleton is almost essential.

Joe Tucci of the Blues outjumps Ryerson's David Thornaby.

Doug Fox goes in for the layup while John Zanette (44) and Brian Hummel look on.

Blues Down Guelph

The Hockey Blues are coming off a big win over the Guelph Gryphons to face a surprisingly strong team from Queen's in a Friday night game at Varsity Arena.

On Tuesday the Blues went to Guelph and thumped the stubborn Gryphons 11-3. The Gryphons were in the game up to the third period.

The Blues took a 2-0 lead in the first period which was upped to 5-2 after two frames. The roof caved in for Guelph in the third as the Blues stormed the net firing up six goals.

The Toronto attack was led by Cary Farelli and Brad Tamblin who each picked up two goals. Single markers went to Rocci Pagnello, Joe Grant, Larry Hopkins, Bob Adoranti, Neil Korzack, Rob Gemmell and Dan Tsubouchi.

The Blues will have to be just as sharp to be successful against Queen's. The Golden Gaels have come up with a win over York and a tie against Toronto so far this season which has put them in second place.

In a doubleheader in Kingston earlier in the season the Blues swept the first game 15-1 but were tied 4-4 in the second. Toronto coach Tom Watt felt the players were "a little cocky" going into the second game. Queen's also got good goaltending and cashed in on their opportunities.

The Blues were leading 4-1 with under 10 minutes left in the game but the Golden Gaels scored once on a power play and twice from faceoffs to even the score.

On Saturday the Blues traveled to London to meet the improved Western Mustangs. The Mustangs are coming off a tough win over York which puts them solidly in second place in their division. They will be hard to beat in front of their home crowd.

Game Of The Week

By JIM McLEAN

Wednesday night's game between Trinity II and Emmanuel at Varsity Arena was anything but an eye-opener. Trinity proved their dominance, downing Emmanuel 6-2. The game was different in that it provided the spectators with a most unorthodox brand of hockey that even the Varsity Blues may be interested in.

Trinity opened the scoring early in the first period with an easy goal by K. Kilbourn from P. Johnston. Number 1, Peter Loughheed (no he wasn't the goalie!) popped one in a few seconds later to tie the game after a goal mouth scramble to give Emmanuel the inspiration and confidence they lacked in the opening five minutes of play.

Trinity, however, wasn't to be left idle as D. Johnson shovelled one in to give his team a slight edge.

As the period progressed, number 29 Rasputin, the goalie, held Emmanuel in the game with some peculiar goaltending. But it wasn't long before Trinity got back on track with a screen shot by Johnson which proved to be the winning goal.

During the second period Rasputin and the goalposts held Trinity at bay for at least eight minutes until number 10 from Trinity scored with a fine assist from number 10. (There were two number 10's on the Trinity roster.) Their names still remain a mystery to me.

Continuing their dominating offence, Trinity's H. Gaskin scored the red's fifth goal after he was allowed at least four rebounds.

Then came Kilbourn's second goal, unassisted, to give Trinity that bulge they needed to chalk up two points in the standings.

Finally the never say die Emmanuel team made a threatening comeback in the last minute with an unassisted goal by M. Snyder. Even more menacing to the Trinity victory was the fact that Emmanuel pulled their goalie in the last minute in hopes of collecting four goals to tie the game.

Trinity "counteracted" that strategy by going into a desperate defensive shell!

This attempt was, however, in vain for Emmanuel for they couldn't penetrate beyond centre ice.

All fun aside the game did prove entertaining for both teams and the spectators. Consistently competent officiating accented the congenial atmosphere of just going out to have a good time.

The 1977-78 edition of the Women's Intercollegiate Basketball Team has begun to establish itself as a contender in the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association (OWIAA) Eastern Division. Collectively they have been referred to as a spunky, fleet-footed, aggressively defensive team, demonstrating both good outside shooting and excellent rebounding. They have proven to be a threat to any team on any given night, and not to be taken lightly as has been the case in past years.

This new image as a serious contender for playoff status can be attributed to many factors. Having players like Sharon Kosmachuk, who is leading rebounder in the Eastern Division, and Barb Grochowski, who is second in total aggressive, tough under the boards, and an all-round great defensive player. 21 years old and hailing from Willowdale, Ontario.

Both Ladies consistently display hustle, determination and above all, dedication to the sport of basketball. Together they inspire their teammates to keep going and to push harder, simply by their own "never say die" attitude. Put either one on the court, and the tempo quickly changes; their influence is just that strong.

In speaking with the two, one quickly becomes impressed by their knowledge of the game, and their confident attitudes towards the future of women's basketball at the University of Toronto. Both Turney and Carson acknowledge that considerable improvements have taken place with this year's squad, but they cite different reasons for this change.

While Janet mentions that consistency is the key to their improvement, Sandy indicates that it is probably due to a more confident attitude. Both captains, however, share the viewpoint that a better shooting percentage from the floor, along with a faster and more efficient execution of plays are also important factors.

As in past years, the Toronto team features a strong 1-2-2 defence with the addition this season of a far more effective full court press.

"Carse" and Turney were adamantly convinced that the increase in practice time has greatly aided in the development of the team this year. Practising five nights a week has increased the team's overall fitness level, while enhancing the opportunities for working on particular aspects of the game.

Carson pointed out that being able to hit the court more often has also allowed the individual team members to get to know each other better, thus contributing to the stronger team spirit.

This year the team practiced regularly until December 23, suitably demonstrating the result of this rejuvenated spirit and an increased commitment on behalf of every team member. "Carse" notes that because of this heightened commitment, Coach Bradley has been able to increase her expectations of the players, assisting them to perform up to their potential.

According to Turney, this year's good core of experienced players has enabled the first year players to progress even faster than in previous years. Carson added to this, by pointing out that as a result the coach is now able to work on more advanced skills in basketball which was not previously possible, because of the lack of experience of these younger players.

Though this year's season is not complete yet, Turney took a moment to reflect upon the team's progress thus far, and how it will affect them next year. "The specific things we do to achieve our goals this year will points undoubtedly helps, but there are other factors involved as well. In basketball, as with any other team sport, it quite often becomes necessary to look beyond the statistics in order to discover these other factors.

This year, one need not look any further than the captains of the team, who have helped to establish a feeling of team unity and spirit that has long been missing from the Lady Blues.

JANET CARSON: Guard. 5'4" explosively quick and unpredictable. 21 years old and hailing from White Plains, New York.

certainly help us, but will at the same time enable us to be much more competitive next year. Only two players will graduate, and so the more experienced personnel will definitely be an asset."

Next year the team hopes to attend a training camp financed through their various fund raising endeavours. The advantages of such an experience are obvious, and so another step towards the Lady Blues climb to excellence in Women's Basketball.

Players like Janet Carson and Sandy Turney are not only well along that road but are also making the route easier for those who are following.

Unemployment forum knocks gov't

By JOHN CAMERON

Workers in Canada must take over the factory system, which the private owners of capital are destroying, if the country's current unemployment crisis is to be solved, said Toronto Alderman Dan Heap Saturday at the Conference on Unemployment.

Heap, speaking at Innis College, charged that the cause of the crisis isn't foreign firms but the system of government "that allows capital to exploit workers." He warned that the unemployment problem "is so serious, even people who aren't experts should think about it."

At various workshops many people from the uninitiated to the well-informed, presented their views on the causes and solutions for the crisis during the day-long conference sponsored by the Innis College Student Council and the Students' Administrative Council.

Ontario Federation of Labour President Cliff Pilkey said that "big-business is blaming the labour force for current economic problems when instead big business should shoulder a large part of the blame themselves." Pilkey assumed the necessity of a comprehensive governmental industrial strategy that would be sectoral in nature and involved in new, viable areas of the economy.

The keynote of Pilkey's argument was that "the strategy must provide a strong manufacturing base and thus provide employment for young people."

Pilkey emphasized that "our nation has relied too much on a branch plant type of economy with too many important decisions affecting our country being made abroad." He also condemned the multinational corporations that reinvested their Canadian profits in other countries.

U of T professor Mel Watkins charged that "raising energy, both petroleum and uranium, prices to world levels is pricing and will price Canadian manufacturers out of the world market."

He made it clear that "free trade on an international level would be disastrous because there is no guarantee about what would survive." He cited the U.S.-Canada Auto Pact, a regulated free trade agreement which is causing controversy in Canadian circles, largely because the cars are assembled in Canada with parts from American companies. Many people would like to see the parts bought from Canadian plants instead, he said.

Watkins stated that the "Canadian government is only supporting the United States' interests when it lends any support to the concept of global free trade."

Board Member of the Social Planning Council Elliott Frerichs said that "government job creation programs aren't readily effective." "The utilization of taxation policies is not cost effective in achieving employment because the government has no control over what is done with the tax savings," he said.

One prevalent view throughout the conference was that the nationalization of efficient industries in Canada would be a major step toward alleviating unemployment problems. It was emphasized that government should not be bailing out inefficient industries in Canada by taking them over when they fail as has been the historical Canadian precedent according to many of the speakers.

VARG NEEDS YOU

Today the Varsity begins recruiting again. Last term we held workshops and ended up with a stable of writers, photographers and production staff who have helped tremendously in putting out this year's paper. Instead of resting on our laurels however, we're going out after those of you we missed first time around. And this time we're in a position to start some of you right away on the in-depth investigative reporting we've been lacking so far this year. No experience necessary — just an honest desire to tackle the big issues before us today. More information on page four.

ONL wants jobs for youth

By URIEL WITTENBERG

Priority must be given to the problem of unemployment among high school dropouts rather than among university graduates, according to a report produced by the Task Force on Youth Unemployment of the Ontario New Liberals (ONL), the official youth wing of the Liberal party in Ontario.

Grant Buchan-Terrell, a co-chairman of the task force, introduced the report at a policy session at the ONL "Show You Care" convention on Saturday. He told ONL delegates that statistics show that the number of university and community college graduates looking for work is "insignificant" and that priority must be given to the least-skilled youth.

He urged massive job creation programs, saying that inflation has too long been used as an "excuse" for the lack of such programs. He agreed with Dale Martin, Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) researcher and a panelist at the session, that such programs need not be inflationary if the funds are obtained by scrapping existing government programs that don't work.

All of the report's resolutions were passed at the meeting, with one minor amendment. The report's first resolution, that the three levels of government co-operate in "the implementation of substantial, new, short-term public sector projects to provide jobs," was endorsed immediately and without discussion.

Prior to discussion of the resolutions, delegates voted on accepting a number of principles set forth in the report. Among these was one stating that given the limited money available to government job creation projects, "priority must be given to those who need help most — the unskilled and longest unemployed — a disproportionate share of which are youth."

Later a new resolution stated that since university and college graduates are "the most highly-invested in of the unemployed," the government should find them jobs.

Both resolutions passed.

Panelists present at the session included Federal Cabinet Minister J.S.G. (Bud) Cullen and provincial caucus member John Sweeney.

Sweeney told the delegates that it is time to "explode the myth that it is no longer worthwhile to go to university."

He said that although it is "not a good idea" to go to university for the purpose of getting a job, statistics show that university graduates have less trouble finding work.

He emphasized the need for highly qualified people outside the professions. "I find it a scandal," he declared, that Ontario had to import nuclear technicians three to four months ago, as well as occupational health and safety experts, although the need for such trained people could have been forecast long ago.

Martin disagreed with Sweeney's suggestion that enough jobs are available but the unemployed aren't trained in the needed skills.

He observed that while there are 15,000 jobs available, there are 300,000 unemployed.

One piece of literature distributed to delegates at the convention bore a large photograph of a smiling Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau emerging from the ONL headquarters in Toronto with a thick suitcase in one hand and a sheaf of papers in the other. The caption reads "take it to the top" in large red letters.

'Advisors needed for Natives'

By JOHN CURTIN

"Wherever there is change there is an element of failure," said Frank Drea, provincial Minister of Correctional Services on Friday to explain the high crime rate among Canadian Natives. Drea said the inability to adapt (particularly common among the Indian community) emphasized the need for counsellors who understood the Indian problem.

Drea, speaking at the closing luncheon of the five-day Native Courtworkers training program at Hart House last week, said that the Native Courtworkers would fill this role, serving as a much needed supplement to the legal aid now available to Indians who have committed an offence.

While the solicitor-client relationship is basically a business affair, said Drea, the Native Courtworker will be more of a "Big Brother" to the offender, offering him a sympathetic ear, moral support and sound advice.

Drea pointed out that education is not the most important factor in choosing the courtworkers, who come from a wide range of backgrounds. Those who have community experience or have raised a family are given prime consideration, since they have the maturity which best qualifies them to reclaim the less successful elements in a Native society which must adapt to survive, Drea said.

New boss at Scar

By NICK MAROTTA

In a well-attended traditional ceremony Professor Joan Eleanor Foley was installed on Friday as Scarborough College's fifth principal.

On hand for the occasion was an array of dignitaries from the university and government including the Honourable Pauline McGibbon, Paul Cosgrove, U of T president John Evans, and Professor Milton Ham.

Evans opened the ceremonies with a speech that emphasized the need for effective leadership to combat the various problems afflicting the university today. Fiscal restraint, the changing demands of the community and altercations between students and faculty call for highly qualified and motivated leadership, Evans said.

Foley then promised "to perform the duties of Principal of Scarborough College as prescribed by Law and by the Statutes of the University," and pledged "to defend the rights and promote the welfare of the College and the members thereof." The chairman of the College Council invested Foley with the robe of office.

John Shalagan, president of the Students' Council, Robert Gardner, co-chairman of the Scarborough College Alumni Association, and Professor V. W. Bladen, senior professor of the college, offered their congratulations on behalf of their respective divisions and voiced their desire to work alongside the new principal on the problems of the college.

Foley's address expressed her concern over the effect financial cutbacks would have on teaching and research, but emphasized that the university would continue to fulfill its obligation in providing the community with articulate and qualified students.

Should foreign artists dominate our culture?

By URIEL WITTENBERG

"We're not stupid in Canada," Catherine Phillips cried to a laughing audience of about 70 on Thursday night in Hart House, in a debate over the resolution, "ACTRA's policy toward foreign artists is beneficial to Canadian culture." Phillips, one of four U of T students debating the Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists (ACTRA) decision to prevent foreign artists from appearing in Canadian productions, argued that Canadians can recognize quality. But in support of the resolution, Peter Duncan claimed that shoddiness here can be "covered up by big-name stars from the U.S." Canadian artists, he said, must go abroad to command respect and recognition, because there is "blatant discrimination against Canadian talent at home." He informed the audience that it is a matter of policy for American guests on CBC's Peter Gzowski show to be paid twice as much as Canadian guests.

The U.S., he said, and "most other countries too," require work permits for visiting artists, but not Canada.

Phillips denounced this argument as a "childish philosophy" of "eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth." If a Canadian performer is good, she said, he or she can go anywhere and is not restricted by the laws of host countries.

Phillips was supported by Honorary visitor Maureen Forrester who said that "if you're a star," one has no trouble getting work all over the world. She had never been asked for a work permit, she said, and she earns 90 per cent of her living outside the country. She noted, however, that although singers have no trouble visiting England, actors are in another category.

Forrester said that she had learned her craft in Canada and is a loyal Canadian, but she had developed her talent by "brushing up against greatness."

Phillips told the audience that "we need foreign actors to push us to the top... Canadian talent will stagnate without competition." She compared the situation to the one in the classroom: students must know they are competing against one another in order to perform well.

Thomas Gough, opposing the resolution, expressed the idea in an analogy: after a long bout of scarlet fever, a man has difficulty walking and must decide how to get into shape. One approach is to lock himself in his room and "not let any other legs get near." That way the man possesses the best legs he can perceive.

The other approach, he explained, is to "race about," get companionship and have a helping hand when needed.

"Ignorance and backwardness is nothing to be ashamed of," Gough declared. He produced some laughter by advising the audience that "a little humility must be brought to the question."

Judith Bradt, supporting the resolution, pointed out that the CBC hired five Los Angeles actors for Canadian culture, she said, cannot be imported.

Gough pointed out that his opponents seemed to be basing their arguments on television. When he thinks of art, he said, he skips right over TV and thinks of theatre. Duncan broke in that ACTRA is hardly concerned with theatre.

The audience laughed when Gough conceded that was unfortunate. However, Gough said, his argument did not depend exclusively on the theatre.

The resolution, voted on by the audience in the customary fashion of leaving by either the exit designated for the ayes or that for the noes, was defeated by a ratio of about 2-1.

Bohne explains U of T Press

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

"Publishing in this country is still in the burgeoning stages and I would like to see the birth of more Canadian publishing houses in the near future," said recently appointed U of T Press Director Harold Bohne in an interview last Friday.

Bohne said that a growing number of good manuscripts have been submitted over the past few years to U of T Press, which is now beginning to feel the weight.

"Most universities in Canada do not have their own press and since we have the expertise and know-how to print technical works, other universities are beginning to offer us funds to printed their faculty members' works."

He asserted that this practice "has existed in the States for some time now and we are, after all, living under financial strains as well."

Bohne stressed that the press did not discriminate by favoring manuscripts written by U of T staff: "Manuscripts from all over go through a rigorous evaluation process before we consider them for publication."

Bohne went on to describe how they were first read by senior editors, then sent on to outside organizations such as the Social Science Research Council for further evaluation. "They are finally read by our editorial board headed by Jack Robson. We then publish them if they meet everybody's expectations. We try to maintain our standards of excellence."

Reports have circulated, including a number of Varsity articles, questioning some of the actions of the press. In September, the press did not submit its full financial statement to the Audit and Finance Subcommittee of Governing Council. Bohne explained that at that time "the Press Board was new and had not yet met. The situation has since been rectified and a complete statement has been submitted."

In connection with the statements of accounts, there have been reports that the press charged unusual interest rates to the U of T Bookstores. Bohne explained that the bookstores "represented a business of $5-million a year." He said that the press calculated the interest payments for the bookstores by adding the interest on inventories to the interest of all accounts outstanding (that is, student credit accounts) and subtracting from that the interest from other publishers.

"You must realize that students pay no interest on their accounts with the bookstore even if they take three months in paying their bills. Furthermore, the only reason we deal with the bookstore in this way is because it is cheaper to have one bureaucracy calculating the accounts than it is to have a separate group dealing with the stores." Other than this "the stores are separate from the Press itself," he said.

Bohne has a long background in publishing and has worked for U of T Press since 1954.

Open Letter to University of Toronto Students who Received OSAP Assistance in the 1976 Winter Session

Certain University of Toronto students, whose OSAP awards processing was seriously delayed by the Government in the 1976 session, may have been financially disadvantaged due to their resultant inability to pay tuition fees on time or their need to borrow money to pay fees.

In order to effect redress, for all OSAP award recipients whose application was received by the Office of Student Awards before September 1, 1976 and whose award was delayed due to Government processing difficulties, the University of Toronto will reimburse the amount by which

i) such students were assessed service charges by the University in excess of $12, or

ii) such students paid interest charges to a lending agency in respect of the period of the delay in excess of $12, providing they document such charges.

The $12 deduction reflects the amount which OSAP included in each award as an estimate to cover such charges. Refunds under $2 will not be made.

Over the next several weeks, the University will examine the files of all OSAP applicants and contact by mail all students who fall into the above categories. Any student who feels he has a claim under these provisions and is not so contacted should submit details of such claim to the Office of Student Awards.

Kindly note that this redress applies in respect of the 1976 Winter Session only.

Tar Heels take trip to Toronto

The 39 "Tar Heels," Southern participants of the North Carolina Students Exchange, arrived at Hart House last Thursday for five days of observing and participating in the social and cultural life of U of T and Toronto.

After the Carolinians were welcomed with a dinner at the International Student Centre, the exchange participants celebrated the Tar Heels' arrival at the Brunswick House, at whose amateur talent night Tar Heel Ty Braswell walked away with first prize for playing a few tunes on his teeth.

Friday the entire group attended a special closed seminar with Marshall McLuhan, who led a discussion on the subject of the laws of the media. Also included in Friday's activities were a trip to the Ontario Science Centre and a Blues hockey game followed by an open party at Whitney Hall's Falconer House.

Saturday afternoon was reserved for tobogganing, a Canadian cultural activity new to most of the Tar Heels. After attending High Mass at St. Mary Magdalene Church on Sunday morning (a contrast with the Southern Baptist service attended by the group in Carolina), the exchange participants visited the McMichael Collection in Kleinberg, on the way to Hart House farm, where they spent the night.

Activities for today and tomorrow include dinner with U of T president John Evans, a "non-talent show," a reception at the Lieutenant-Governor's suite at Queen's Park, and an open seminar featuring five leading magazine editors.

Trent homophiles

The rotten threat to your funding because you are a "politically and sexually oriented group comprising non-student members" was written up in The Varsity, the University of Toronto student newspaper, and thereby came to our attention.

Other examples of problems for service-oriented groups for lesbians and gay men have been occurring lately in Ontario. Harbinger, a counselling service at York University has had its funding cut from $8,000 to approximately $3,000 this year. A lot of its counselling work was done with lesbians and gay men. Another example is that two men from the Gay Alliance Toward Equality have been given $300 fines and 6 days in jail for postering. Since gay ads are not accepted in newspapers, it is hard to advertise without postering, which is, after all, hardly a crime.

Cutbacks are bad enough for everyone, but if organizations struggling to begin services for women whose whole lives have been seriously damaged by having to repress our sexuality were to fold, lesbians would be faced with the decision of having no job or going back in the closet. It's hard enough to come out when jobs are not scarce. Now we face the danger of not finding another job for a while if we are fired. The fact that the Trent Homophile Association went into Warkworth Penitentiary for an information session with the prisoners attests to the usefulness of your organization.

We badly need our organizations. In Toronto, for example, we have very visible proof of the need for the Lesbian Organization of Toronto. (LOOT). Women are piling into LOOT at an increasing rate. There are over 300 on the mailing list in one year of our operation. Even the old gay-straight split does not seem to be deterring women from investigating what a lesbian atmosphere can be like.

The three categories of your cutbacks — "political and sexual orientation" and "non-student members" — make it clear that cutbacks are not random but are directed at us specifically for the type of work we do — bringing out different possibilities for sexual behaviour which makes heterosexual society seem very narrow and unimaginative.

Even if you lose funding, don't fold, as you have proved your need to the gay community. LOOT and the Three of Cups Women's Coffeehouse were formed deliberately without using government funding in order to avoid the danger of withdrawal of those funds once dependency was formed, and also to avoid being too easily scrutinized by those who "serve and protect." However, we have managed — with a great deal of hard work — to survive and grow strong.

LOOT

Ed's note: This letter refers to an article published in November.

Editorial policy

On Friday, January 13, an article appeared on the Varsity editorial page, signed by the editor, Mario Cutajar. The article gave Mr. Cutajar's opinion of Dr. Harry Parrott and the new student aid plan. It was not official editorial policy, just the personal views of the editor.

Several of my constituents were very upset about the content of the article, which appeared to represent the official editorial policy of the Varsity, as it appeared in the editorial space and was signed by the editor. I explained to them that since the article was signed (editorials are always unsigned) it was merely the opinion of Mario Cutajar, and not the editorial policy of their paper. Editorial policy is determined by the entire Varsity staff, and no matter how radical an individual editor may be, staff democracy would help to insure that the editorial policy of the student newspaper would closely represent student opinion.

But the damage has already been done. How many students in the University know that an article appearing in the editorial space and signed by the editor is not an editorial? I wonder how many students read that "non-editorial" and others like it, and assumed that they were reading the official Varsity editorial policy.

Now I am not suggesting that the editor is ignoring staff democracy and trying to pass off his opinion piece as editorials, but at very least the practise is misleading.

In the future all opinion pieces appearing in what is usually the editorial space should be followed by a disclaimer, explaining that the article is the personal opinion of the author and does not represent the official editorial policy of the Varsity newspaper.

Clear and accurate.

Contact sports

In light of the recent decision by the Department of Athletics to limit female participation in contact sports, an independent study under the direction of J. J. Kitchack has been commissioned to investigate the possibility of limiting female participation in contact sexual activity.

While admitting that there is no considerable evidence to indicate women are more susceptible to injury when having sex with men, Kitchack seems to regard the increased chance of pregnancy as an important determinant in the decision.

He also felt that such a move would not severely constrain relationships since women at St. Michael's College seem to be happy with non-contact sexual activity.

Reaction to the study has been mixed. While women at Victoria College seemed concerned with the transition from sexual to non-sexual contact, spokesmen from the Body Politic, frequently quoted by the Toronto Sun, hailed the proposal as progressive and as "what we have been saying all along."

The most apathetic comment was from the SMCSU Finance Commissioner who stated, "Who cares? With my recent luck, it's no loss."

WORKSHOPS SCHEDULE

What kind of person works for the Varsity? Students like yourself. To prove it we're scheduling 3 days of workshops for people interested in working for the Varsity. No matter how inexperienced you are by the time the workshops end you'll have an assignment to work on. Monday and Wednesday are teaching workshops. Thursday, you can come and actually help us put out Friday's paper. Dates and times are as follows.

MONDAY AND THURSDAY

12:00 NEWSWRITING

Introduction to the rudiments of news reporting: the logic and purpose of news, style and how it fits with the function of news and how the Varsity goes about getting news and editing it.

REVIEW WRITING

Review writing is different from news writing both in style and purpose. The workshop will examine the peculiarities of review reporting and the system of reviewing in the Varsity.

SPORTS WRITING

Sports stories are written in a style similar to straight news. This workshop is therefore a short addition to the news writing workshop.

FEATURING WRITING

See the outline on page 5.

RESEARCH AND INVESTIGATION

News stories tend to present events in a disjointed, even trivial, fashion. To make heads or tails of what goes on around us requires one to take a look at the patterns behind the individual stories. In order to perform this function the Varsity is organizing a number of research groups or bureaux, each dealing with specific areas of investigation. The OSAP and Student Employment group will have its first meeting today at 2:00 pm. The people in the group will discuss how they're going to organize it, what they want to research and how to divide the work. If enough interest is shown other bureaux will be organized. Possible areas of investigation: SAC, the function and structure of the university and university education, women in and out of university, international affairs, etc.

4:00 LAYOUT

After the news has been gathered and edited it has to be laid out on pages of the paper together with any relevant photos and graphics. The task is to layout the paper in the most attractive, readable way possible. The workshop will outline established ways of achieving this.

PHOTOGRAPHY

THURSDAY

12-4:00 Follow the flow of copy from the moment it comes in to the time it arrives at the layout table.

6:00 Layout begins around this time. Just about this time we usually have a short meeting to help decide the editorial position for the following day. Join the discussion and add your opinion.

U of T hosts gala China Week

By MAUREEN ROACH

Representatives from eight universities in Ontario and Quebec have banded together to produce China Week here at the International Student Centre this week. Promoted by the Chinese Student Association, China Week includes workshop, movies, games, talks, a souvenir sale and a Cultural Night.

According to the president of U of T's Chinese Student Association, Wing Tsui, China Week grew out of the apparent inadequacy of the annual Chinese Film Festival and Cultural Night to promote the desired "cultural exchange and understanding" between Chinese and Canadian people.

The association decided therefore to launch a more large-scale effort in the form of individual and joint projects with other universities.

The guest speaker list of China Week this year includes Felix Greene, journalist, author and broadcaster. Greene's visits to China have resulted in several books and movies.

Dr. M.C. Niu and Professor S.Y. Tsau will also give talks. Niu is a former researcher in the Central Research Institute in Taiwan and is currently a professor of Biology at Temple University in Philadelphia. Tsau is a graduate of Peking University and U of T, currently teaching in the Language Study division of York University.

The second major event of China Week will be a series of lunch hour films at the ISC. These, Tsui asserted, will comprise a wide coverage of China from recreation and culture to technical advances.

China Week also includes a table tennis tournament open to all students, a Cultural Night at North Toronto Collegiate Institute on Jan. 29 and sale of souvenirs at the entrance of all the events.

varg feature

Scandals, interviews, exposes, humour, and investigative stories; these are just some of the articles appearing in the centrespread of the Varsity every Monday and Wednesday as vargfeatures.

While news articles must be short and concise, vargfeatures allow a reporter more space to explore in detail his subject matter. Here are some of the topics awaiting writers: Freedom of Information at U of T — what documents are secret and what rules govern them; U of T Beverage Service and U of T Physical Plant — two university service monopolies — are they fair?; U of T Research — how is research funded, which projects are selected, and who reaps commercial profits from new inventions; The Annex — how has this community changed as a result of U of T expansion; Religion at U of T; TYP — the controversial Transitional Year Program; Course Unions — what do these student-funded organizations do?

If you would like a chance to investigate any of these topics, or if you have an idea of your own, drop by to the Varsity and sign up to write a vargfeature. Workshops today and Wednesday at 1:00 PM at 91 St. George St. will provide information on just what is required in newswriting and features writing.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

Election Reminder

Prospective candidates for election to the Governing Council are reminded that nomination papers must be filed by noon on Friday, January 27th, 1978. Nomination forms and copies of the regulations (Election Guidelines) covering the election are available from the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, or the Registrars' offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

There are vacancies in four teaching staff constituencies and all eight seats in the three student categories.

Nominations must be signed by the following number of nominators:

— Teaching Staff	10
— Graduate Students	15
— Full-time Undergraduate Students	30
— Part-time Undergraduate Students	15

Present members of the Governing Council whose terms expire on June 30th next may be nominated again if they are continuing in the same constituencies for which they were elected previously. Those elected this year from the teaching staff constituencies will serve for three years from July 1st, 1978 and from student constituencies for one year, as required by The University of Toronto Act, 1971.

Descriptions of the constituencies were published in the Varsity on January 16th. Enquiries for further information should be directed to the Governing Council Secretariat at 978-6576.

Election shall be by mailed ballot.

Swimmers Dive In

By JIM O'LEARY

The U of T Swim Team kicked off their 1978 season with a win over the University of Alberta and a loss to York in dual meets held at York University on Friday night.

Despite being outpointed 70-43 by the number three ranked Yeomen, Blues' swim coach Robin Campbell was not overly concerned. He was quick to point out that the Blues did not have their full team and that the rules in dual meets work against Toronto.

The rules in dual meets are different from championship meets in that some events are dropped to make the meets run more quickly. In Friday's competition these rules aided York. There was not a 100-metre butterfly event for Toronto's best swimmer, Dan Thompson, to participate in. Instead of a sure first-place finish, Thompson was forced to compete in events in which he is not as strong.

Toronto's best performance was turned in by diver Helder Viera who took first place in both the one and three-metre events. This marked the first time in years that a U of T diver has won a diving event.

For Campbell, Viera's performance was the most pleasing aspect of the meets. An improvement in Toronto's divers could be the difference between first and second place in the Canadian championships.

Last year Toronto outpointed

Jumpers Pace Tracksters

By JIM O'LEARY

The indoor season for U of T's Track and Field team got off to an unimpressive start as a severe winter storm forced many competitors to miss the trip to London for Western's quadrangular meet.

Teams from Michigan and McMaster were snowed in leaving the U of T and Western as the only competitors at the meet. Even the U of T team was at far less than full strength.

Despite the weather, several Toronto performers turned in excellent performances.

Rob Pitters won the high jump with a leap of two metres. Teammate Carl Georgevski placed a close second also jumping two metres.

Tom Worndall placed first in the pole vault with a leap of 4.45 metres while Bob Hart, also of U of T, came second.

On the track, Marc Rispler won the 3,000-metre event with a very good time of 8:47 with teammates Phil Buckley and Jeremy Williams placing right behind.

For the women, Jill Ross turned in an excellent performance winning the 600-metre event in a good time of 1:34.1. She led every inch of the way to finish less than two seconds off the intercollegiate record.

Waterloo by 64 points in swimming events but lost the diving part of the program by 70 points to finish in second place. Campbell is confident that U of T swimmers will continue to dominate the swimming events and is looking for the divers to take some points from Waterloo. If Helder can score 18 points in diving events it will probably be more than enough to give Toronto the national championship.

With only a little more than half their team the Blues had no trouble downing Alberta. Alberta is ranked number four in the country.

Alberta's entry in this meet marked the first time there has been a dual meet between competitors from Eastern and Western Canada. In the near future Simon Fraser will also be sending a team East to compete in a similar meet. According to Campbell these interchanges mark an era of improvement in Canadian University swimming.

SAC CELEBRATES WINTER WITH BARDE

If ever there was toe-tapping, foot-stomping, hand-clapping music, the music of BARDE is it. The songs are sung in English, French, and Gaelic accompanied by orchestration that can only be fully appreciated in a place like Convocation Hall. These six musicians with their fiddles, mandolins, accordions and tin whistles bring to life music that has its roots in old Brittany, Ireland and Scotland.

So if the cold winds of January have you down, join us for an evening with Barde, Thurs. Jan. 26, 8 p.m., Convocation Hall, and we'll share a good rowdy old time.

Blues Score 20 Goals In Weekend Wins

The Varsity — Shawn O'Driscoll

Toronto's Dan Tsubouchi raises his arms to signal one of the 10 goals scored by the Blues against Queen's.

By HOWARD DEANE

The Varsity Blues played one of their best games of the season Saturday night, beating the Western Mustangs 9-2, at London's J. Thompson Arena. The first period was the only time when the game was even close. Only one goal was scored and that was by Toronto.

The Blues dominated almost every facet of the game. Very few passes were missed, or intercepted by Western, and they had no problem carrying the puck out of their own end.

Mustang Head Coach, Ron Watson commented, "If you get behind, they come out flying. They are physically stronger. With guys like D'Alvise our little guys are losing out. I look forward to playing Toronto, though, because it shows us our weaknesses."

Toronto Head Coach, Tom Watt, felt that, "This was probably our best game of the year."

Doug Caines opened the scoring less than three minutes into the first period. He took a pass from Alex Jean at the blueline, got in behind the defence and nailed a low backhand between the goalie's legs.

Rob Gemmell scored Toronto's second goal on a hard drive from the point at the beginning of the second period. Midway through the period Dan Tsubouchi rammed one home, on a power play, to put the Blues up 3-0. Thirty-one seconds later Cary Farelli increased the lead to 4.

Western replied only seconds later with a goal that was tipped into the net. Caines scored once more for Toronto, and with twelve seconds left in the period Western captain, Dave Nadeau, scored to send Toronto to the dressing room with a 5-2 lead.

The Blues played an error free third period, scoring four goals on only 14 shots. They continued to dominate in the slot and were able to make numerous fast breaks from their own end. Toronto goal scorers were Cary Farelli, Rocci Pagnello, Dan D'Alvise and Doug Caines.

Goalie Dave Jenner got his first point of the season assisting on the last goal of the night.

Poor Shooting Leads To Loss For B. Ballers

By CRAIG WARDLAW

The Varsity Blues Men's Basketball team dropped a close 67-63 decision to the Western Mustangs Saturday afternoon in London. Toronto played the obliging guest role perfectly, before a good crowd of home town fans as they kept the game close but never seriously threatened the Mustang's superiority.

The game was characterized by apathetic action and atrocious shooting on both sides. Toronto was 28 for 83 in field goals for a terrible 34 per cent average and Western was even worse with 28 for 93 to give them a 30 per cent field goal average. As both teams hit 28 times the difference in the final score came at the foul line where Toronto made only 7 of 24 tries.

Toronto was behind 38-32 at the half and came out for the second period with their shoe-laces tied together. Western's lead quickly built itself to 12 points before coach John McManus of the Blues showed the boys how to tie their laces properly. Toronto then fought back in a flurry of action that highlighted the game and actually tied the score with a few minutes remaining.

Western, however, easily hung on for the win with some excellent defence and a couple of fast baskets.

The star of the game and Toronto's only bright spot was centre Randy Cook. Before being fouled out of the game he hit for 21 points and completely controlled the boards at both ends.

Other scorers for Toronto were Frank Wenzl with 13, Tim McGhie with 12, John Zanette with 7, Doug Fox with an unusually low 6 and Brian Hummel with 4. For Western the big guns were Francis Moccio and Bruce Tomlinson with 12 apiece. Toronto plays two away games this week against Ottawa and Carleton. Hopefully this non-conference match against Western will sharpen them up for the upcoming league games.

Randy Cook delights the crowd by stuffing the ball.

A small contingent of Toronto tracksters participated in a tournament at York. Of these, high jumper Steve Dovaston turned in the best performance winning his event with a leap of 1.95 metres. Dovaston is the number three ranked high jumper in Canada and is coming off a ligament injury to his foot.

Craig Stevenson won the 800-metre event in 1:56.8. In the 3,000-metre run, Phil St. Louis and John Ptolemy placed third and fifth respectively.

English proficiency testing okayed

By KATHY CANTY

A more structured curriculum for Erindale College and English proficiency tests on the St. George campus are now one step closer to becoming a fact of life at U of T.

The final proposals of Erindale's controversial "New Program" received overwhelming support from the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science at their meeting on Monday.

Two weeks ago the committee passed a resolution that students at Erindale College be required to complete at least one course from the humanities, the natural sciences and the social sciences. It rejected, however, the recommendation that Erindale students be compelled to take either two courses in a language other than English or two courses in the field of mathematics.

Under the proposals passed this week, students at the suburban college who complete their degrees with 15 credits must have a minor concentration in an approved field of study. Students completing their degrees with 20 credits, however, will be required either to specialize in one academic field or fulfill the requirements for two minor concentrations.

In addition, the committee endorsed a resolution that students at both Erindale College and the St. George campus will have to pass an English proficiency test within 12 months of their first registration.

The imprecise wording of this motion temporarily threw the meeting into confusion as the members discussed just what the proposal meant. A number of speakers also complained that the multiple choice type of proficiency exam was exceedingly difficult. It was resolved that a special committee will be formed to decide what kind of English test the students at the downtown campus will have to write.

All of the new curriculum regulations are intended to apply to students entering the Faculty of Arts and Science after July 1, 1980. These measures will have to receive the approval of the Governing Council, however, before they can be implemented.

According to Brian O'Riordan, Students' Administrative Council (SAC) University Government Commissioner, Governing Council could greatly alter a number of the new curriculum regulations. They will be worried about whether or not the university has the resources to follow through with these measures. "Erindale didn't give any of the resource implications of any of this," he added.

O'Riordan has mixed feelings about the results of Monday's meeting. The regulations requiring students to concentrate in specific areas of study "will be detrimental to part-time students at Erindale, because only evening classes are available to them, he said. It won't affect full-time students too much since 80 per cent of them concentrate their courses already, added O'Riordan.

Speaking of the "New Program" Desmond Morton, Erindale Vice-Principal, said, "I was relieved that we got it passed." He didn't seem too worried that the motion dealing with English and Math requirements was not passed. "I'm probably satisfied" with the way the program looks now, he said.

Visa students need authorization to work or study here.

Tough to get in

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

Foreign students wishing to work or study in Canada must obtain permission before they enter the country, according to the new Immigration Act. They will in effect have fewer rights said Richard Gathercole, U of T law professor.

Speaking on Monday at a conference on international education, Gathercole explained that foreign students will have neither the right to appeal nor any access to legal aid in case they are arrested.

Although he feels there have been few real changes made to the act, Gathercole is concerned that a security certificate for visa students had been made essential.

Criticizing the "broad regulatory power of the government" and the "broad discretionary powers allotted to administrators," Gathercole said that provisions should be made for foreign students who may unexpectedly need to find jobs.

"Students should not have to go all the way back to the country they came from simply to obtain authorization," said Gathercole.

Gerry van Kessel, of the Employment and Immigration Commission, quoted J.S.G. (Bud) Cullen, Minister of Employment and Immigration: "Students will not be permitted to change faculty or institution once they enroll to shop around. Only for 'legitimate academic reasons' would students be able to change schools."

Before leaving their native countries, foreign students will be required to submit the name of the institution accepting them, their intended course of study, and the period of their authorized stay to the provincial Department of Education, according to the act. Van Kessel stated: "Students would only be able to extend their authorizations if the respective province found their reasons acceptable."

With regard to student employment policies, the new Immigration Act remains the same. Students will be allowed to work only if a landed immigrant or a Canadian citizen cannot fill the position. Policy concerning foreign students accepting teaching positions is still under discussion.

Van Kessel sees the responsibility of his commission as one of "bringing together foreign students and institutions. Their health and their background must meet standard regulations. A student cannot have a history of terminal cancer, or of making Molotov cocktails."

Upon entry into Canada, the student must present a letter of acceptance from his institution of study, proof of adequate funding for the duration of his stay, and he must have more than a rudimentary knowledge of the English or French language, according to the act.

GAA, admin at loggerheads

By BLAIR HUNTER

After five months of bargaining, negotiations between the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) and the university administration have come to a standstill after the latest round of talks on January 12 failed to produce agreement on the issue of salary increases retroactive to September 1977.

"The administration in their contract proposals did not want to grant retroactive pay increases to the union members. This brought the matter to a head. The GAA has since applied to the Ontario government requesting the appointment of a conciliator in this dispute with the hope that a return to the bargaining table would be forthcoming in the near future," said GAA business agent Jean Greatbatch.

Greatbatch added "Stalling on negotiations and forcing conciliation is a standard management ploy. This kind of tactic is extremely unfair considering the size of the GAA's budget."

"A conciliator has to be paid for. If the negotiations drag on for months and months it means nothing to the administration but is a great financial drain on the GAA," she said.

John Parker, U of T's Manager of Labor Relations and chief negotiator for the administration, denies the charge that the university is purposely stalling.

Parker said, "The collective bargaining processes sometimes break down when the two sides fail to reach an immediate agreement. We welcome the appointment of a conciliator as a useful assistant."

When contacted by the Varsity yesterday Greatbatch said in previous negotiations the GAA was told that in order to obtain a contract with more than the administration's offer of a five per cent salary increase it (GAA) must drop most of its non-monetary demands.

These demands include several major items such as improved working conditions, establishment of formalized lines of communication between the union and the administration, early notification of job appointments and reduced tutorial size. In addition to increased salary demands, the GAA is asking for a job reclassification so union members are paid according to their job rather than their level of certified education.

Greatbatch explained, "If the GAA's new contract does not succeed in getting the salary increases back dated to Sept. 1, then we have been involved in these months of expensive bargaining for nothing."

It is unknown when the negotiations will begin again, according to Parker, but "the administration is available as soon as possible once the conciliator has been named."

$22,000 leftover up for grabs

By JOHN CAMERON

The U of T Sesquicentennial Celebrations Council underspent their budget by an amount of $22,000 according to a report recently tabled by Sesquicentennial Celebrations Co-ordinator Marvi Bradshaw.

U of T President John Evans expressed no surprise at this revelation and noted that such things are the "natural pattern if people observe their budgets carefully."

Several Sesquicentennial programs have requested a portion of the money to cover deficits incurred in their operations. The various dramatic productions, the program sponsored by the Medieval group, and the reception held after the U of T long service awards, are the programs receiving the most serious consideration according to Evans. Taken together, the deficits accumulated by these programs could well consume the entire figure, he said.

However, Evans emphasized that the people behind these various programs are also soliciting other sources of revenue to cover their deficits. He cited additional Wintario grants as an example.

Evans hopes that the money will not be spent at all but stated he "is afraid that a good bit of it will be."

However, "there is no obligation for any of the $22,000 to be spent," stressed Evans, who would like to turn as much of the money as possible into the university's general budget.

The decision regarding the fate of the unspent balance rests entirely in Evan's hands.

The total budgeted costs were $150,000 with by far the largest portion of the unspent balance occurring in the area of the coordinator's salary and office costs, as this represented slightly more than $20,000 of the figure. A total of $55,000 had been budgeted for those costs.

The budgeted events occurred during 1977 and ranged from a lecture series and various conferences to gala events such as the Hart House Birthday Party and Tree-Planting Ceremonies. There were musical events such as the Orford String Quartet Beethoven Series sponsored by the Faculty of Music, festivals, plays, exhibitions, sports tournaments, and open houses.

According to Bradshaw's report, the university received the equivalent of $200,000 worth of print publication space for Sesquicentennial events. In addition, the report mentioned that there was extensive coverage of many of the major lectures and ceremonial events on radio and TV.

Int'l athletics coming

By JIM O'LEARY

If the recommendations of the International Sub-Committee are accepted by the Athletic Council, U of T could become a training ground for athletes of international calibre as early as next July.

The International Sub-Committee, established last November to develop a policy for international sport at this university, tabled a report at the meeting of the Excellence Committee Monday night recommending that U of T "provide opportunity for athletes in a few carefully selected sports to pursue world standards of performance and to provide for empirical research into the requirements for excellence in these sports."

The international program proposed will be distinct from the existing intercollegiate program with separate funding, coaching and co-ordination.

The pre-requisites for such a program would include the establishment of a full-time co-ordinator, high calibre coaching and availability of adequate facilities. Financial support from athletic scholarships or Sport Canada for athletes lacking independent means and arrangements to allow students to study part-time during training are also essential according to the report. Finally, the development of testing, research and support services from the Faculty of Medicine, the school of Physical and Health Education and the Department of Physics is said to be necessary.

In the opinion of the sub-committee "the University possesses enough of them (basic requirements) now to enable it to make a good beginning on the international program."

It is recommended that none of the money for such a project be taken from user fees but rather be paid for by the Athletic Department from money it receives from the university. Other sources of revenue would be Sport Canada, the T-Holders Association and private donors.

Coaches and clubs wanting "international sport status" would have to submit an application outlining such things as coaching qualifications, availability of facilities, plan of development and the necessary budget. This application would then be reviewed by the international co-ordinator and a standing sub-committee created to oversee the running of the international program.

Davis shifts U of T governor's post

By GRACE ANOBILE

A phone call from Premier Bill Davis put an end to former Governing Council vice-chairman Sidney Hermant's 32-year career in U of T's government system.

On December 15 Davis, on behalf of the Ontario Cabinet, told Hermant he had been appointed Chairman of the Board of Trustees at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM).

"I had to resign my position on the Governing Council on December 31 because my appointment at ROM began January 1. There was nothing I could do. The Premier appointed me to the Governing Council and now he appointed me to ROM," Hermant said in an interview.

He said he had two immediate reservations about accepting the new post. First, he feels strongly that boards themselves (such as the Board of Trustees) should recommend candidates to the premier who should act upon the recommendations. He wasn't sure how the members at ROM were going to react to a new man among them. Second, he is still emotionally attached to U of T.

"I would have stayed at the university till hell froze over but it was clear Davis wanted me for the job at ROM," he explained. "I would have been much happier staying — it's like leaving my family."

Hermant's duties as the board's new chairman should be familiar to this university government habitue. He will preside over the monthly meetings of the board which makes bylaws, rules and regulations for the museum; appoints a director for the museum; and enters into agreements with other schools and institutions with the same goals as the ROM.

When asked for his views on the recommendations of the Macdonald report, a five-year external review of Governing Council, Hermant was eager to speak his mind.

"Macdonald did a thorough job. Basically he said the president of the university should have a higher profile and the five standing committees of the Governing Council should merge into only three. Personally, I think Macdonald is just maintaining the status-quo," he said.

Hermant's own recommendations are more reactionary: "The present unicameral system (the Governing Council) is not a good one, but it is being forced to run. It's like if you have a piano and something goes wrong, you don't throw it out, you tune it."

He continued, "The role of the students in the decision-making policy should be to attend open meetings, to communicate ideas, but not help make policy. It's more logical to send ex-officio of SAC to the council to present the student viewpoint rather than elect student representatives in the Governing Council. I would like to see a return to the bicameral structure (the Senate comprising academic staff and alumni and the Board of Governors, composed of government appointees) rather than have the unicameral system," he stressed.

"Parity of the students will be a student political cry for all time, but I don't agree with it," said Hermant. "Until they graduate and have gone through the university system, students do not qualify to pass judgment."

Hermant transferred to ROM.

Hermant added that the perfect system would include a Presidential Advisory Council in which students could be elected as well as teaching staff to give a balance between the academics of the Senate and the government appointees of the Board of Governors.

How to play the energy game

By DAVID ZELDIN

Promoting the study of new ways to cope with the energy crisis is the purpose of a new group on campus. The Organization for Alternate Resource Techniques (OART), founded this September by fourth-year engineering student Glynn Williams, is attempting to foster a greater awareness of alternative energy sources such as wind, solar, tidal, nuclear, biomass and geothermal.

Williams cited dwindling energy supplies as one of the key problems which will be facing society in the years to come. He wants to ameliorate the problem of lack of communication between researchers and people directly involved in the "energy game", such as economists, geographers, physicists, politicians. Therefore, OART will try to draw membership from all disciplines on campus, he said.

"Energy is what it's all about," says Williams. "Unfortunately a little bit of knowledge does a lot of damage."

In a recent interview he cited nuclear energy as an example of great misunderstanding. "Nuclear energy alone is not the answer. It has to be part of a mixed bag. But we are not totally opposed to it."

Williams is optimistic that other forms of energy techniques can be implemented right away to replace the use of fossil fuels for some purposes. Swimming pools could be heated by solar energy, he said. He added that with approximately 6,000 new swimming pools being built in the city every year solar energy can be used quite easily instead of wasting fossil fuels. He also claims that the heating of buildings, which uses up 30 percent of conventional fuel, can be reduced by two-thirds.

OART is running a number of lectures, workshops and seminars this year to promote greater awareness of energy alternatives. So far it has brought in a number of eminent people in the energy field including Professor Hooper of Nuclear Engineering to speak as well as Phil Coulter, an expert in wind energy.

OART wants to eventually bring about the creation of an energy department in the university.

Family roots in Africa

By JOHN CURTIN

The concept of America as a training school in civilization for Blacks to learn to live in nuclear families is both paternalistic and racist, said American scholar Herbert Gutman.

Speaking on Monday about the Afro-American family in the first of a lecture series sponsored by the American Studies Program, Gutman exposed the historical fallacy that the Black nuclear family was created by American society.

Gutman, a professor at New York City University, produced substantial evidence that Afro-American family culture originated in Africa and is not a feeble attempt to imitate the family structure of its oppressor.

The distinctly African tradition of kinship can easily be seen in Gutman's detailed study of plantation workers. He shows that there were many significant differences between the Black family structure and that of their overlords. Whites married their blood relations, said Gutman, while Blacks considered this taboo.

The distinctly African element in the Black American family is, according to Gutman, "the keen awareness of kinship — not of the family per se — but of the kin-group." He said this spirit can still be seen today in some Black communities where garden produce is considered communal property shared by all.

Gutman related the story of Lucy, a Black girl uprooted from her family and sold out of state in Alabama, to further illustrate the strong bonds of kinship between Blacks. Twenty-five years after Lucy disappeared, families in the district still named their children after her.

Unemployment will check wages:

— Toronto Star, Jan. 19.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprises. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

Trudeau says unemployment will keep down wages and hence prices.

ENGLISH TESTS

Beginning in 1980 10,000 U of T students will have to pass an English proficiency ("literacy") test or leave the university. As many as half of these students may end up leaving university. Why?

If we are to believe Erindale's associate dean Desmond Morton the testing is "an effort to prevent the so-called illiteracy in students." According to Professor Margot Northey, originator of the test, students "do not know how to follow through ideas logically." The solution is the literacy test which according to Morton is "beneficial for the students... because English is the language they must use and if they find they are lacking in it, they are encouraged to seek help."

Interesting argument. The government slashes the education budget, high school classes are larger than ever and Desmond Morton thinks the best way to help students is to have them pass a literacy test or leave university. This is an example of following through an idea logically.

There's another slip of logic. If English is the language that students have to use in high school and at university then presumably a person who makes it to university and is able to survive here is proficient in English. If you can properly answer questions phrased in English you will pass your exams and get your degree. That is the only possible measure of English proficiency that makes sense. Anything more than that is redundant.

So why proficiency testing?

It's a clean way to cut down the number of students at university. Not only that but to do it in a way that can be disguised as an attempt to help the very students the scheme will discriminate against.

This explanation is certainly far more consistent with current government educational policy than the official rationale. We are living in a period of high unemployment under a government that is determined to reduce the number of university graduates. The same government has also shown flagrant disregard for the quality of education in Ontario and the students affected by it.

Proficiency tests have to be viewed as one more screening process, one more attempt to reduce the number of people the government is willing to invest in. They will not improve the quality of university education. The Ontario government did away with that long ago. What will happen is that along with crowded classrooms, inadequate equipment, poor teaching, debt and deadlines you and students like you will have to put up with Northey's inquisition.

If that doesn't make you a better student what else could?

Common cause

We are writing to express our disappointment over Phil Ryan's comments attacking UTFA's salary requests in the middle of a letter dealing with students' concerns about J. B. Macdonald's review of the Governing Council. In the present climate of cutbacks, such a letter from a student member of governing Council serves only to encourage the provincial government in its policy of undermining the quality of post-secondary education in Ontario. For by attacking UTFA's salary requests, Mr. Ryan tacitly accepts the principle of cutbacks itself and its key metaphysical formulation — the image of a pie whose size is not open to discussion, but only how it is to be divided up.

In comparison to other, less affluent provinces, Ontario's commitment to post-secondary education has been shrinking over the last decade — first among the provinces in 1966 in per-university student spending, Ontario now ranks eighth. If we — students and staff — accept without a whimper that next year's "pie" will increase by only $9 million, as stated in Mr. Ryan's letter (a 4.6 per cent increase in this year's operating budget), the entire provincial system of post-secondary education will be the loser; and the spectacle of the different constituencies at the U of T fighting among themselves for a bigger slice of that pie will make it all the more easier for the provincial government to announce next year, an even smaller increase.

Ryan is correct in estimating that the size of the university grant from the province will increase by approximately $9 million next year — though this is not its only source of income. But UTFA's total package would mean an increase of $10 million, not Mr. Ryan's $12, and the equivalent package for support staff would probably mean a total increase of $14-$15 million. In asking for more money, the faculty does not expect or want an increase at the expense of other sectors of the university, but an equivalent increase for all sectors.

This raises some hard questions. If the provincial government is unwilling to meet its responsibilities and commitments to post-secondary education, the university must begin to discuss more openly with all its members both its spending and its funding, including the possibility of a deficit budget adequate to maintaining the U of T. The present budgetary process, through which the administration keeps all figures secret, makes it impossible for the university community to democratically determine how the budget should be apportioned. It is not the Faculty Association which, in seeking to keep up with inflation, is acting irresponsibly, but the provincial government and its willing spokesmen in Simcoe Hall.

Those members of the faculty who have pursued their own "go-it-alone" strategy at the expense of university students and non-academic staff, share in the responsibility for a situation where Simcoe Hall divides and conquers at will. It's time for faculty and students to stop quarreling among themselves and take a united stand against any further erosion in the provincial government's commitment to an accessible and worthwhile system of post-secondary education for the people of Ontario.

Must produce our own food

By BILL NANKIVELL

There are alternatives to the established solutions for tackling the world's food problems, and they can start right here in Canada, said American author Frances Moore Lappe. Lappe spoke before a full house at the Medical Sciences Auditorium on Monday night.

The author of "Food First: Beyond the Myth of Scarcity" and "Diet for a Small Planet," Lappe was here helping kick off Nutrition Week in Canada.

She spoke of established policies towards third world food crises, their implications and pitfalls and some alternatives to these policies. Self-reliance and self-determination should be the key to providing a solution, said Lappe, and this applies not only to Third World nations but to Canada.

Lappe stressed the importance of recognizing that our local problems are similar to those of underdeveloped nations. We do not require merely increased food production, but a change in attitudes, she said. We must not depend entirely on big "agro-business" for our food supply, but try and aim at producing locally for ourselves, an attitude which would solve problems here and abroad.

During the question-and-answer period Lappe discussed food co-ops as a good vehicle for education. She said they are proof that big business is not necessary for a satisfactory distribution of food.

stories. In order to perform this function the Varsity is organizing a number of research groups or bureaux, each dealing with specific areas of investigation. The OSAP and Student Employment group will have its first meeting today at 2:00 pm. The people in the group will discuss how they're going to organize it, what they want to research and how to divide the work. If enough interest is shown other bureaux will be organized. Possible areas of investigation: SAC, the function and structure of the university and university education, women in and out of university, international affairs, etc.

LAYOUT

After the news has been gathered and edited it has to be laid out on pages of the paper together with any relevant photos and graphics. The task is to lay out the paper in the most attractive, readable way possible. The workshop will outline established ways of achieving this.

Rochdale College: experimen

By Victoria Freeman

The ugly grey high-rise at 341 Bloor Street West has stood empty for over two years; Rochdale College, the "vertical flophouse" which shocked and outraged many an upstanding Toronto citizen, is now only a harmless ghost. While there have been interminable arguments over the future of the building, there is general agreement about its past: Rochdale was an ugly blight on the city, a corruptor of young people and a mockery of the free school it was intended to be.

Only the people who lived there, their friends and a few observers know differently. As they see it, Rochdale provided a unique and profoundly educational experience of far more relevance to the problems and aspirations of society than a conventional university career. According to Henry Tarvainen, a director at the St. Lawrence Centre and a former Rochdalian, "If ever there was a place that has been utterly misunderstood and misinterpreted, Rochdale is it."

Rochdale College was born in the early sixties, when Campus Co-op, an organization offering accommodation to U of T students in thirty co-operatively run houses, wanted to expand to meet the needs of an overcrowded university plagued with a student housing shortage. Howard Adelman, a professor at York University, and other members of Campus Co-op, planned a low-cost, cooperative high rise student residence as an alternative to cold and uninspiring university residences.

The building was designed to mix ordinary one and two-bedroom apartments with more imaginative room arrangements encouraging communal living.

An offshoot of Campus Co-op, Co-op College Residences, was formed to build the high-rise, while another group of Co-ops, Toronto Student Management Corporation, was hired to manage it. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation financed construction of the eighteen storey, 850-bed residence with a 90 per cent mortgage; four other mortgages covered the remaining 10 per cent of the cost. The building was named Rochdale College — Rochdale, after the town in England where the co-operative movement was born in 1844, and College, to qualify as an educational institution and so be exempt from realty taxes. A supplementary educational program was planned to add substance to the name.

Education too

Some dissatisfied members of the university community approached the developers with a proposal to run the education program. They wanted to escape the rigid, standardized and compartmentalized approach of the modern "multiversity" in favour of an educational program based on student needs.

Poet and former English professor Dennis Lee attracted many people to the project through his article "Getting to Rochdale," in which he envisioned a revolutionary college which would be owned and operated by its members, and would fuse education and day to day experience through cooperative living arrangements.

Admission requirements, accreditation, lectures and professors were to be avoided in favour of more informal groupings of people who could teach each other. While Lee contemplated the possibility of a true "liberal education" for self-directed, intelligent students who were stifled by university, other members of the original group saw Rochdale as a place where the creative arts could flourish.

But a combination of a construction strike, poor planning, misleading media coverage and the "youth revolution" frustrated the hopes of the early founders. The building, which was scheduled to open in time for the school year beginning September 1968 did not open even partially until October and not completely until January, forcing many students who had originally planned to live there to find accommodation elsewhere or to double up. When it first opened, the building lacked windows and was littered with debris left over from construction.

Toronto Student Management Corporation had done little of the planning necessary for the management of such a large building; methods of organization which had worked well in small co-op houses were disastrous when applied to Rochdale. People moved in and claimed rooms without telling the rental office; often special rental arrangements were made but not recorded, with the result that rent collection was haphazard and accurate records unavailable. In order to boost occupancy, many more non-students were allowed to move in than had been planned originally; as a result the population was far more random and diverse than had been expected.

From its inception, the newspapers had characterized Rochdale as a "hippy college." This public image attracted the "street people" of Yorkville, most of whom cared more about Rochdale's promise of freedom to "do your own thing" than its educational philosophy. Although roughly half the building was occupied by fairly 'straight' university students, the remainder consisted of a volatile mixture of artists, radical activists, hippies, drug dealers, bikers, groupies, families, crazies, pensioners, doctors, lawyers and others with outside jobs. One of Rochdale's greatest achievements was to create a community from this jumble.

Academics Flourish

From the beginning, the dictum "Nothing is normal in Rochdale" described life in the building. The atmosphere was hardly conducive to the self-discipline and intellectual rigour necessary for the community of scholars envisioned by Rochdale's founders. The academically-oriented projects floundered and disappeared; many of the original Rochdaliens, worn out by the hectic pace and prevailing anarchy, disillusioned by the lack of interest in their projects, left the building. The press became increasingly critical of the "hippy college" and labelled it a failure.

Although the Rochdaliens were not interested in a "liberal education", there were still a number of educational projects in the building, and while they went through cycles of activity and neglect because of internal politics, lack of money and the mood of the residents, over the years Rochdale's achievements were considerable. The Theatre Passe Muraille, Coach House Press, Anansi Press, the Canadian Whole Earth Almanac, the Alternative Press Index and the Canadian Film-makers Distribution Centre were all developed or affiliated with Rochdaliens. Rochdale sponsored social services and various craft and recreation.

These activities were overshadowed, however, by unpleasant developments within the building. Motorcycle gangs and speed freaks took over the building, causing noise, vandalism, intimidation and violence. Newspaper stories describing the availability of drugs and sex attracted hundreds of crashers — sometimes 300 per night — and runaway teenage girls flocked to the building.

The increased demand for drugs turned Rochdale into the largest drug distribution centre in Ontario and perhaps in North America; on a Friday night sometimes 3,000 people would enter the building to purchase drugs. According to Alex MacDonald, a former member of the Rochdale Governing Council, "the fame and notoriety of Rochdale was legend all over the youth scene in North America and thousands came from all over to see, feel and experience".

Tensions and Infighting

This steady flow of people into the building caused many problems. Strangers wandered around "freaking out" on bad drug trips; a few people jumped out windows. The crashers and visitors littered the hallways and were inconsiderate of the residents, who had a hard time adjusting to the fact that their home was now "Shopper's Drug Mart" (as Alex MacDonald put it). Tensions and infighting escalated between such different groups within the building as the drug dealers, the hippies, the bureaucrats and the "sleazes".

Police started raiding the building several times a week at all hours of the night or day, sometimes in numbers as large as seventy or eighty. Although an arrangement had been worked out with police whereby any search warrant was to be presented to the security guard at the front door so that a Rochdale guard could be present at the arrest and could open any doors with a pass key, the police occasionally ignored this procedure and in a show of force broke down doors unnecessarily, ransacked rooms, and pushed people around. A riot was narrowly averted on several occasions. Rochdale residents felt that the police were deliberately trying to incite and harass Rochdaliens in an effort to create such bad press for Rochdale that it would be closed by public pressure.

Rochdale's public image couldn't have been worse. "Phoney Rochdale College Spreads Dread Asian VD!", "98 per cent Of Rochdale Residents Take Drugs Inquest Is Told — Boy Found Dead In Bed", "Policemen Cornered, Pelted With Eggs in Rochdale", the headlines screamed. Editorials appeared on "The Rochdale Disaster" and recommended closing the building because of the social problems: problems which sensational press treatment had helped to attract to Rochdale in the first place. Local politicians, sensing political mileage in an issue which offended the morality of the general public, waxed eloquent in their condemnations of Rochdale and their demands that it be closed. York mayor Phillip White asked "How can the Government continue to allow such a place, such a hotbed of vice, corruption and immorality to exist?" Rochdale, because it was downtown, and high-profile, became the focus of the "straight" world's irritation against the emerging counterculture.

What the public didn't realize was that Rochdale had not created its social problems; it had merely collected them and accepted the fact of their existence; Rochdale became a haven for those who had nowhere else to go. Closing Rochdale would not have made these problems go away; they would simply have been easier to ignore. In addition, the Rochdaliens were making serious efforts to understand and deal constructively with these problems. As former President Peter Turner said: "We are damned not for our problems but for our honesty."

Haven from Chaos

Rochdale's problems were very much a product of its times. In 1968, the year Rochdale opened, Martin Luther King and Robert Kennedy were assassinated, Paris was crippled by a prolonged uprising of workers and students, the Democratic Convention in Chicago erupted in violence, and student protest, particularly against the Vietnam war, was spreading to many North American campuses. The chaos and dissent of the sixties had profoundly influenced many of those who came to Rochdale; as Alex MacDonald put it, they blundered around "alienated and lonely, trying to figure out why they were unhappy with their privileged position in the richest society in history, knowing only that the solution lay not in the direction their parents had pointed them (in) . . . and willing to try just about anything else".

The remarkable thing about Rochdale was that it was often able to help the alienated and confused to sort themselves out. First of all, it was a haven from the "straight" society which they had rejected, and which was therefore unable to help them; the compassion and understanding of those Rochdaliens who had "been there" contrasted favourably with the non-comprehension and hostility of society at large, and the large number of people with the same problem at least provided company.

Secondly, Rochdale gave these people the freedom to rebel against what was expected of them in "straight" society and to experiment with "doing their own thing". But since they were living in a closed environment, they had to live with the consequences of their actions. A typical "alienated youth" would arrive at Rochdale and spend the first few months rebelling against all authority and devoting himself to having fun, mainly by getting stoned. Frequently, newcomers would confuse freedom with licence, often bothering other Rochdaliens with inconsiderate and irresponsible behavior. Although Rochdaliens were far more tolerant of noise, dirt and craziness than most people, eventually the new resident would learn that even at Rochdale he must not infringe on the freedom of others.

Ideals and Reality

Peter Turner, a former Rochdale president, described this socialization process: "The new resident who is bothering others suffers the consequences of his actions in terms of social estrangement, which is more effective than in society at large because these are the people he identifies with . . . his activities are not against some nebulous authority but his neighbours." If he did not respond to social pressures or the judicial system, he was asked to leave, which was a serious matter, since, as someone who rejected North American society, he had nowhere else to go. Iain Jull, who arrived at Rochdale at age 16, verified this process: "I explored the boundaries of what I could do; for me it was tremendously educational".

The intensity, complexity and instability of Rochdale forced many into a confrontation with their own selves. Many people deliberately sought out experiences that would "blow their minds", partly to rid themselves of their 'hang-ups'. Anthropologist Kent Gooderham, who lived in Rochdale with his family, likened Rochdale to a large scale encounter group "Subjects who join therapy groups expect to find out about themselves and their world by ignoring the everyday world and subjecting themselves to a pressure-cooker process in which a selected group of people will tell them how they appear to the world outside their own ego. They will gain a new perspective — they 'find themselves' through other people. The goal is rarely reached without considerable pain on the part of the patient."

Rochdale not only gave the alienated a sanctuary from 'straight' society and a chance to rebel against its materialism, technology, economic and social structures, conformist social norms and joylessness, it also provided the opportunity to develop positive alternatives. Rochdale was in many ways a microcosm of society; it had its own government, bureaucracy, technology and educational systems and police force, all of which were organized differently from those of traditional society. Because they had to live with their decisions, Rochdaliens were able to learn far more from their experiments than from innumerable theoretical discussions. They had to integrate their ideals and reality.

Those who had any thing to do with running any aspect of the building gained considerable insight into the difficulties of trying to change society and also a new perspective on 'straight' society. A large number of those who lived in Rochdale did not care how Rochdale was run, partly because many were transient; those who did have little or no experience in living cooperatively or in applying cooperative principles to a high-rise of 850 people.

Creative Solutions

Because the socialization process described earlier was repeated over and over again, there were always many people around who rebelled against authority of any kind; they called anyone who tried to make rules or run the building "power-tripping fascists". The continuous suspicion of authority made Rochdale's government unusually responsive to the general mood of the building. However, this was sometimes detrimental, since the general population did not concern itself with economics or other realities of running a high-rise.

The essence of Rochdale was that anyone and anything was acceptable until the freedom of others was infringed upon. Everyone was given the benefit of the doubt and so problems were slow to be solved. When unruly speed freaks or crashers caused problems, there was always a conflict between those who wanted to try to help social misfits and those who wanted to protect the community. This unusual tolerance and compassion resulted in much of Rochdale's bad press; only after missionary efforts had failed did Rochdaliens outlaw amphetamines and ban dealing to the outside world.

There were many creative and unusual solutions to Rochdale's problems. One of these was the development of communes, which often occupied the entire east wing of a floor. These attracted people who were committed to making Rochdale work and gave the building a domestic tone; they were the most successful aspect of the alternate lifestyle of Rochdale.

In 1971, after Rochdale College had missed several mortgage payments, CMHC foreclosed on the mortgage, but because of a legal dispute with the holder of the second mortgage could not take possession. A receiver was appointed to manage the building until the court case was decided. The receiver hired professional security guards, "the greens", to take over security from Rochdale's own guards, and gradually emptied the building. Many Rochdaliens who had come to see Rochdale as almost an independent country and did not wish to rejoin the 'straight' world, refused to leave. The struggle between the receiver and Rochdale's bitter residents was long and unpleasant, and lasted until 1975, when the last residents left the building. The building was finally awarded to CMHC and then sold to the City of Toronto. Since then, it has stood empty, partly because of a dispute over whether it should be used for mixed housing or senior citizens.

Contrary to public opinion, the foreclosure was not the inevitable result of irresponsible hippie management (though there was incredible mismanagement the first year), but of the debt structure itself. According to Alex MacDonald, "the building was conceived on the understanding that it would have two mortgages (it had five), that it would not have to pay really tax of $10,000 a month (which it did) and that the cafeteria (which opened late and lost thousands) would operate at enough of a profit to cover the utilities". Nor did the initial financing take into consideration the seasonal fluctuations in occupancy or the fact that 240 double rooms were unrentables as doubles.

The Real Reasons

Before the foreclosure, Rochdale's Governing Council had asked the federal government to renegotiate the mortgage, but public pressure made this politically unfeasible. The real reason for the closing of Rochdale was the hostility and misunderstanding between Rochdale and the public. What few people realized was that the disorganization and turmoil of Rochdale did not signify the failure of Rochdale but the profundity of the educational experience it offered. The tragedy of Rochdale was that although it was supposed to be experimental, it could not afford to make mistakes or be different.

Today, the Rochdaliens are decentralized; some are in other countries, some are on rural communes, some are in mental institutions and some are in jail. Most former residents work in the city and many are raising families. Oddly enough, Rochdale is still alive in the eyes of the police — the annual Rochdale reunion was broken up by a large-scale police raid and several arrests were made, allegedly for public drunkenness.

While most Rochdaliens look back on Rochdale as the most exciting and important experience of their lives, some are lost without it and live continually in its shadow. Some were truly broken by the long struggle against eviction. Others have used the social and personal education they gained there to live in the straight world without completely compromising their ideals; perhaps these people are Rochdale's real graduates.

NO SLOWING DOWN

Dr. Harry Parrott's January 12th visit to the U of T did not put an end to SAC's involvements and concerns with the present Student Aid Programme. The work of the U of T Student Aid Committee is still going on and all those interested in lending a helping hand or in sharing their thoughts should contact SAC now.

Obviously, there is a great deal of interest in the new plan, as demonstrated by the number of people who showed up to pack the house at the January 12th meeting with Dr. Parrott. Welcomed as a sign of possible hope was the statement by the Minister that the Student Aid Programme is an evolving one. (Perhaps, as it evolves, it will straighten out and become a more useful tool for students.)

Meanwhile, work goes on: the OFS Executive and the Presidents of Student Councils of Ontario universities and community colleges will be meeting with the Ontario Provincial Cabinet in early February. At this meeting student aid is bound to be discussed, specifically student demands for the elimination of the grant eligibility period, as well as the government drawing up a realistic parental contribution table.

Right now, Miriam Edelson, OFS Chairperson, is travelling through the province talking with students, university governing bodies and other interested parties about the new programme. Ms. Edelson spoke with the SAC Board of Directors just before the Dr. Parrott meeting and will be back at the U of T to talk with Student Society Presidents on February 1st.

Student pressure and activity have brought about significant improvements in student aid in Ontario, such as the abolition of arbitrary summer saving's requirements. Continued pressure and activity are necessary to bring about a truly effective Student Aid Programme.

BARDE CONCERT TOMORROW

In co-operation with CHUM-FM, the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto will present Barde live at Convocation Hall, tomorrow, Thursday, January 26th. Advance tickets are now available at all SAC ticket locations.

If ever there was toe-tapping, foot-stomping, hand-clapping music, the music of Barde is it. Barde is a super group of musicians who play fiddle, accordion, mandolin, tin whistle, bodhran, concertina, tenor and five-string banjo, dulcimer, psaltry, guitar, and recorder. Barde possesses a depth of musical skill that will astound you. Hear songs in English, Gaelic, French and Scottish! Barde, tomorrow, Thursday, January 26th at Convocation Hall. SAC students $2.00. Non-students $3.75.

FRIDAY IS THE LAST DAY

Nominations are now open for the eight student seats on the Governing Council of the U of T and will remain open until this Friday, January 27th at 12 noon. All interested parties are advised to pick up application forms in Room 106, Simcoe Hall.

The Governing Council of the University of Toronto is vested with the government, management and control of the University. Student members of the Council participate in this sometimes-involved but always interesting process.

"In light of the changes recommended by the External Reviewer of the Governing Council, which would diminish student representation to a token voice," SAC President John Tuzyk said, "I feel it is vital that students elect articulate and active representatives to the Council to ensure that students retain an effective voice."

Of the eight student seats available, there will be two graduate student seats, two part-time student seats, and four full-time undergraduate student seats up for grabs. Undergraduate candidates must be Canadian citizens and will need at least 30 names on their petitions.

SAC maintains liaison with the students elected to the Governing Council through its University Government Commission. The current University Government Commissioner, Brian O'Riordan, would be happy to answer any questions you have about the election or the Governing Council. Voting will take place through the mails during the first two weeks of March.

THE STUDENT ADVOCATE

The January issue of the Student Advocate, available free throughout the U of T campus, features articles on the present unemployment crisis and student employment in general. The Student Advocate is a publication of the National Union of Students.

You'll want to read informative interviews and articles six times a year in the Student Advocate.

Tickets are available for the SAC-sponsored Roam Around this Friday, January 27th, featuring Hott Roxx, The Christopher Ward Band, and Offenbach.

Where will you be this May?

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

This year's edition of "What can I do this Summer?", produced by the U of T, its Guidance Centre and the Faculty of Education, hit the stands last week in good time for students trying to find a way of using their four-month break — whether they have a job or not.

The book, written six years ago by Carl Bedal of the faculty and updated by him annually, is directed not only at university students but also to those in junior and senior high schools.

The book's first section deals with the various ways of finding a summer job and contains a myriad of descriptions of available jobs. It describes various federal and provincial government programs including "Young Canada Works" and "Experience 77". Student placement centres and Canada Manpower Centres are the two most important agencies which can help people find jobs, according to Bedal.

The clear message of the booklet is "If you want to catch opportunities (for paid employment), you almost need to start planning yesterday." The industries which are historically most accessible to job seekers are tourism, construction, government, private business, farming and agriculture.

The booklet describes how employees are usually selected through questions about background and interests and provides a sample of a typical resume. Insight is given into what employers think of employees and how one's behaviour during a summer job can affect his or her chances of being rehired. It also describes opportunities open to those who wish to be their own employer.

The second part describes alternatives to summer employment, ranging from volunteer work with everyone from the elderly to blind children, to vacationing in your province, your country or abroad. It details the network of hostels in Canada and the variety of discounts available in the right mode of transportation at the right time. The book also describes the virtues of going to school during the summer.

The booklet is sold at the Guidance Centre.

The Varsity — Bill Stratas

Student Sharon Silers appears less than impressed by a weighty little volume about summer job opportunities and alternatives to working.

Those Birdies Are Flying

By GLYNIS PETERS

At the Ryerson Invitational this week-end, U. of T. was neither represented in full strength by numbers or ability. Out of a possible 12 entrants the Blues numbered only 3 men but the competition was only a prelude to the more important meets coming up in the near future.

The competition was very stiff with the hosts, Ryerson, definitely the team to beat. In the singles, Toronto was knocked out in the early rounds and did only slightly better in the doubles division.

Coach Marj Shedd disregarded these results and looks forward to the coming events of her team. The men's team, composed of Dave Crosbie, Greg Jackson, Stephen Yu, Jai Deep Lal and Andrew Whiteway will compete in the divisional at MacMaster this Friday. Out of Guelph, Bröck, Mac. and Toronto, two teams will advance to the sectionals and MacMaster this Friday. Out of Guelph, Bröck, Mac. and Toronto, two teams will advance to the sectionals and MacMaster is expected to provide the stiffest opposition. It is a little frustrating for Shedd to know that Lucio Fabris and James Muir, both highly ranked players at the national level and students at U. of T., are too busy in other areas to compete for the Blues. She is satisfied with the squad as it stands now, however, and feels fairly confident that they will advance this week-end.

Coming up for the women is a meet at Waterloo on Thursday involving all 10 Ontario teams. Toronto is ranked fourth at the moment with Mac. and Western offering the strongest opposition. At the OWIAA finals that will be held on February 9 & 10 at MacMaster both individual awards and team awards will be given.

In the former category, U. of T.'s Jennifer Rogers stands a good chance if she can beat one particularly good player from Western. Carol Gombita has equally as good a record as Rogers in both doubles and singles and forming the rest of the 6 woman team are Sharon Beattie, Cathy Kono, Bev Schurr and Rona McDonald.

Fighting Blues Surprise Foes In First Half

By KATHY CASEY
The Lady Blues basketball team ventured to London last Saturday to sports

Side Down ...And Out

By SANDY GRANT
Last Thursday evening the Lady Blues Volleyball team hosted Guelph. The Blues can perhaps have been viewed as being a little over-confident going into the early part of the game, as previously in their season they had defeated Guelph 3 games out of 5. Thursday's game, however, saw the Blues trying hard, but never quite coming close enough to defeat the Gryphons. Though the scores were all close (15-13), the Blues' loss to Guelph puts them into second place. They are now tied with Guelph behind York whose team commands first place.

Last night the Blues tackled York and this week-end they will take part in the Tier II Interlock Tournament at Ryerson.

take on the Western Mustangs in what proved to be a very exciting contest. Though rated slight underdogs to the powerful Western team, Toronto's determination and skill was too much for the lady Mustangs in the first half. Co-captain Sandy Turney and Karen Pim just could not miss the target, each having scored 11 points by the end of the first 20 minutes. Western was obviously not expecting such dominance by the Toronto squad and found themselves down 35-29 at the half.

Both teams returned to the floor anxious to get play underway. It became obvious in the first few minutes of play, however, that the Blues were lacking some of the speed and shooting accuracy they had so clearly demonstrated earlier in the match. Western took advantage of Toronto's situation and rallied to record a narrow victory over the Blues by a score of 66-58. Turney and Pim finished off with 16 points each, with Barb Grochowski coming close behind at 13. The leading scorer for Western was Marty Demaree with 17 points.

The Lady Blues certainly proved their capabilities far beyond many people's expectations last Saturday. In light of this fact the team should be very proud of their achievements. The team's next home game is February 1, against Brock and gets underway in the Benson Building at 7:30.

Farelli: From WHA To Blues

By HUGH STUART

College coaches across the country must have braced themselves for a long hard season after hearing that Cary Farelli would be playing for the Varsity Hockey Blues this year. Yes, the same Cary Farelli who was the second leading scorer in OHA Major Junior A history.

After such an outstanding junior career, fans might have expected to see Farelli in an NHL or WHA uniform this year, and had he not injured his knee last season, Farelli believes that he would have gone in the first or second round of the NHL draft. However, the early season knee injury cost him the scoring record (to Detroit rookie Dale McCourt), final season exposure to the professional scouts, and it cast a shadow of doubt about his durability in high calibre play.

As a result, Farelli was not drafted until the eleventh round (by Montreal). The WHA Birmingham Bulls also acquired his playing rights and because of the stiff competition that he expected to receive at the Canadiens' training camp, Farelli went to Birmingham. At the end of their camp the choice was to sign a mediocre contract with the WHA club and probably spend some time in the minor leagues, or come to U of T to get an education and play for a top college hockey team. The decision was elementary, and obviously coach Tom Watt is happy to have him.

Changing from a predominantly offensive player into a better two-way player has been one of the major adjustments that Farelli has had to make. He sees one of the major differences between college and junior hockey as being the fact that: "Here in college hockey the players are older, stronger, and more experienced than they are in junior. It makes it harder to take people off the puck. I no longer have sixteen or seventeen-year-olds playing on the same line with me. That took quite an adjustment, and hurt my play."

After a slow start (for him), Farelli is now happy with his play. Farelli and linemates Larry Hopkins and Dan D'Alvise are all firmly entrenched in the top ten of the OUA scoring race. They were also on the Canadian Student National Team that went to Europe last Christmas. Farelli found the trip to be a valuable and enjoyable experience, both on and off the ice. "I'd never been to Europe before and I really enjoyed seeing the sights. On the ice I learned a great deal about the European style of play," says Farelli.

Where his career will take him depends a great deal upon what happens this summer. Under a new rule, all players, regardless of their age, are eligible to be drafted this summer if they hadn't previously signed a professional contract. Although Farelli had been drafted he hadn't signed a contract so this draft means that he may be able to escape the clutches of the exceptionally talented Montreal organization and earn a regular spot somewhere else in the league.

The Physical Education student is prepared for all possibilities. If he doesn't get drafted or if prospects do not look promising he'll be back at U of T for another year. However, there is little doubt that Farelli is hoping that his education will be delayed so that he can pursue a pro career.

Cary Farelli

Queen's Edges Blues on Slopes

By DINO SWRITH

The U of T Alpine Ski Team strengthened its record with a second place finish in the Waterloo Invitational last Friday.

Queen's men dominated the competition with all their team finishing in the top ten. David Lech made up a 0.5 second deficit to finish first.

Mark Bell and Mike Owen, both of U of T, were ahead of Lech after the first run but Bell skied slower and Owen lost a ski in the second trip. Owen has shown flashes of his old form but has had trouble putting two good runs together so far this season.

For U of T, Bell ended up in second place, Grant Wilson finished 7th, Bill Hartman 20th and Steve Christie 25th.

Trent University finished third overall. They are asking quite well this year and are in a position to beat out Western for an invitation to the Can-Am intercollegiate meet at Lake Placid in March (only the best three schools in Ontario are invited).

In the Women's section, Susan Graves of Waterloo took first place. In second place was National "C" team member Martha Hall from Guelph. Jane McGillary of Queen's skied well to take third place ahead of Western's Marilyn Rollins.

Toronto's women's team is having its problems this year. Veteran Andrea Esson is looking for suitable bindings. On Friday, faulty bindings caused her to fall at the first gate of the first run. Similar problems caused her to lose the championship last year when she lost a ski in the final race.

Without Esson supplying the necessary points, the team finished sixth on Friday. Individually for the U of T women, Karen Kingsmill finished ninth, Kerstin Schumacher 11th, Brenda Webster 25th and Karen Thompson 38th (but with a good second run).

Women's coach, Donny Lowes is worried about the slow start of this year's team but can only shrug when asked what has to be done: "I don't know. My only hope is to start building for 1980."

Wrestlers Fifth At Guelph

By ANGELO CALLEGARI

Eleven of Toronto's top wrestlers teamed up to take fifth place in the prestigious Guelph Open last weekend. U of T captured one first, one second and two third place finishes from a very tough field representing over a dozen universities.

The Guelph Open is one of the top annual meets in Canada and draws competitors from across Canada and the North-Eastern United States. Among the many national and international champions competing was 1976 Olympic gold medalist John Peterson (177 lbs) from the United States.

U of T's Clive Llewellyn, fighting at 167 pounds, turned in a spectacular performance to beat Pan-American gold medalist John Dwyer to take first place in the 167 pound class.

Rob Moore, 142-pound veteran, had a very good day, finishing second to Mike Barry of the University of Western Ontario. Fighting in one of the toughest weight classes, Moore beat Pan-American gold medalist Doug Yeats and Canadian National Team member Leo Reynolds to get to the final.

U of T rookie Al Tamane placed third in the 118 pound class in one of the most exciting matches of the tournament. Tamane overcame a two point deficit in the last five seconds of the match to take a 6-5 decision from his Western opponent.

John Knap took third place in the 190 pound class. Ed Rector fought well, but ran into stiff competition and was eliminated in the second round.

In the 177 pound division, Jack Brodbrazenski lost to John Peterson of the States and beat an opponent from Laurier, before being forced to withdraw with strained shoulder muscles.

Other U of T wrestlers who were eliminated in the early rounds were Sam Turchiaro, Allan Kosugi, George Montreuil and Angelo Callegari. In the heavy weight division, Eric Boss dropped two decisions to finish in fourth place.

U of T's next competition will be a dual meet with Western in London tonight.

Blades Cross At Capital

By JIM SCARROW

Rising at the grand hour of four o'clock last Sunday, the men's Epee team flew up to Ottawa for the Carleton University Invitational Tournament to compete against some of Ontario's best fencers.

Because of the large number of teams competing, (twelve in all), U of T received a "by" on the first round. This meant that U of T was advanced to the second round of competition without having to win the first round. The "by" was indicative of the respect for the Toronto team, generated by last year's first place win in the OUA Championships.

After an exhausting day of over twenty matches per fencer, the Epee Team of David Hames, Jim Scarrow, Bruno Schersinger and Wolfgang Wehrfritz, placed third overall against some impressive competition from RMC (1st) and Carleton (2nd).

The fencers are prepping for the Eastern OUA sectionals which will be held on February 5th at Hart House. Spectators are very welcome.

SAC reaffirms fees referendum

By ERIC McMILLAN

The student council (SAC) is going ahead with plans to ask students for more money next year, although the exact increase is not yet known.

The SAC board of directors reaffirmed Wednesday night an earlier decision to hold a referendum on raising SAC fees, over the objections of a small number of members who complained of "accounting b.s. no one can understand."

Finance commissioner Doug Robertson said SAC needs higher fees in light of inflationary costs and a decreasing undergraduate enrolment. He presented a series of revisions to this year's budget raising expenditures over $15 thousand to $380,607. The budget includes a $41 thousand deficit.

SAC is funded mainly through a $12 per capita levy on undergrad students. The increase, if passed by referendum, would probably raise fees to around $17.

Tom Simpson (Engineering) led the attack on the referendum in spite of the current deficit. "This is the biggest deficit in SAC's history, but so what? A few years ago we had the biggest surplus in SAC's history."

Communications commissioner Doug Gerhart pointed out examples of misspent money and asked, "Are you going to ask students to pay for that kind of waste?"

Robertson answered that budgetary cutbacks had been only "mildly successful" and that the "megaplaning" proposed by Simpson and Gerhart was really "blow-out planning."

Robertson couldn't answer Simpson's question on how much money is available to SAC in mid-October, the crucial period during which SAC fees are forwarded from the administration to the student council's account. However, President John Tuzyk said later SAC has a standing balance of about $70 thousand to get it through last summer until the fees were collected. The figure drops each summer when the year's deficit is subtracted, he said.

Afterwards Simpson said the fees referendum passed because the Services Commission had been told that "no referendum means cutbacks and to them that's death."

Services commissioner Philip De Groot argued SAC should put the referendum through this year because it has a better chance of winning now than next year when SAC will have less money to hold visible activities on campus. Like a few other members he made an analogy with Pierre Trudeau's calling an election this spring while the Liberals are still high in the polls.

Tuzyk and external commissioner John Doherty argued in favour of a fees hike because SAC would be vulnerable to attacks from the university administration if it did not receive improved funding.

Council voted 29 to 16 against rescinding the earlier decision for a fees referendum. The referendum will be held together with the SAC elections in March.

In other business, SAC agreed to give Erindale Radio (CFRE) a $6,000 loan for building a second studio.

High winds led to desperate measures to keep on one's feet yesterday.

Ill winds blow

By ANDREW MAHON

Blizzard conditions greeted U of T students yesterday as the campus was invaded by high winds and blowing snow which officially closed the university at 4 p.m.

Among the victims affected by the wind conditions was Rachel Winkfield who fell at the corner of Hoskin and St. George early yesterday morning. "I was walking to work and the wind blew me over," explained Winkfield. "That corner (Robarts and St. George) was a sheet of ice."

After police cars, ambulances and a fire-engine rushed to her aid, Winkfield was taken to Toronto General Hospital where her injury was diagnosed as a tailbone fracture.

Another accident at that same location involved two Victoria College students who fell together on the sidewalk. One of the students, Nancy Kim, bruised her knees while her friend broke her nose.

"It hurts a bit but I'm okay," said Kim after she was discharged from Toronto General. "I won't be coming to school tomorrow."

The adverse weather conditions forced University officials to start closing buildings in the afternoon. As of 3 p.m. it was "just a matter of getting people out of the buildings" according to campus security.

There were numerous reports of broken doors and windows, but most of the damage was considered "minor" according to the Physical plant Director's office.

Profs argue unemployment

By ARTHUR ROTENBERG

Industrial specialization and reduction of foreign ownership were two solutions to Canada's unemployment crisis, proposed by U of T professors during the Economists' Forum at University College on Wednesday.

John Crispo argued that Canadians need an industrial strategy similar to that of Sweden with specialization in products where we have a comparative advantage. He pointed out that we can't have as wide a range of appliances as the U.S. with one-tenth the market since economies of scale wouldn't be permitted and Canadian products would be uncompetitive.

Mel Watkins agreed that the economy needed restructuring (the only thing that Crispo and Watkins admitted to agreeing on), but argued that the problem lies in the structure imposed by foreign ownership. He claimed that the dependence of Canada's economy on foreign firms (the so-called "branch plant economy") reduces managerial opportunities and discourages research and development.

Professor Harry Eastman, Chairman of the Department of Political Economy, mildly supported some other suggested remedies to high unemployment. He agreed with one questioner from the floor that government should support more research and development activities to provide jobs for university graduates. Then, when asked about job creation, he referred to Hubert Humphrey's full employment bill and said "government should be the employer of last resort." Earlier, Eastman had stated that government should not control industry to achieve desired employment but should make Canada a more attractive place for industry to operate.

Beyond these few solutions, panelists spent most of the forum explaining causes of the unemployment crisis. Crispo cited Canada's dependence on world markets, her excessively high standard of living, her poor competition position due to low economies of scale and the unbalanced supply and demand situation for university graduates as these main causes. To indicate how bad demand for graduates will be within universities, he said: "The fossils I work with now will be here until I die — there won't be any new faces." Eastman illustrated when he thought the situation would improve by responding: "John (Crispo) will be dead by 1990."

Eastman focussed on the imbalance of supply and demand for university graduates to explain unemployment — oversupply because of the baby boom and low demand because of cutbacks in university and government hiring. To absolve universities of blame for their cutbacks, he said: "University administrators are handmaidens of government because they spend the money handed to them by provincial governments."

Watkins mockingly paraphrased Eastman and Crispo's references to oversupply of graduates by saying: "You were born at the wrong time — better luck next time." He also introduced his rebuttal by the words: "This panel has become massively boring . . . assembling four economists is a recipe for disaster."

Watkins was most intent on driving home his criticisms of foreign ownership. "Multinationals have different space and time horizons from Canadian companies," he said.

In response to a question on job creation, he attacked the Alcan pipeline agreement because it didn't absolutely guarantee steel contracts to Canadian companies, thus losing potential jobs to foreigners.

Depts. avoid Poli Ec 'solution'

By SHANE PARKHILL

Few departments are considering restricting enrolment to their first year courses on the basis of students' high school marks, according to a sampling of opinions by the Varsity. While none criticized the recent decision of the Political Economy Department to make an 80 per cent Grade XIII average a prerequisite for its Introduction to Economics course (ECO 100), those department chairmen contacted said they had no similar plans under consideration.

"Anyone interested should at least have a chance at a first year course" in sociology, said Sociology Department Chairperson Lorna Marsden. The Man in Lorna courses taught in high schools do not really constitute sociology courses, she said, so high school marks cannot really be used as a special restriction on students planning to take sociology. She admitted the situation might change as a result of future budgetary restrictions, but felt that her department would be more likely to respond by transferring teaching staff from higher level courses to the introductory ones. (The Political Economy Department plans "to release staff resources" at lower levels for upper-level work.)

Acting Psychology Department Chairman R. S. Lockhart said that although there are 2,000 students in Introductory Psychology, his department is "organized to cope with it" through the use of tape-slide units to reduce lecturing time. He added there are few psychology courses in secondary schools, so that high school marks were "less valid" for their purposes.

He foresaw no sharp increase in enrolment in psychology courses, and felt that his department could handle future budget cuts by decreasing the number of instructors, films and equipment demonstrators, and cutting back on the operating hours of the instruction rooms. Although Lockhart declined comment on the proposed action of the Political Economy Department, he said that it "raises the whole question of how good high school grades are as a criterion for entry" into university.

Overcrowding is not a problem in first year chemistry courses, according to Department Chairman K. Yates. Although Yates does not expect the situation to change significantly in the near future, he said that if it did he suspected his department would do as the political Economy Department had done. He felt that judging students on the basis of their marks was preferable to balloting, or to accepting applications on a first-come-first-served basis which, he added, would militate against students from northern Ontario.

History Chairman W. J. Callahan said that students in his department could choose from a variety of courses in their first year and that, although some courses are "under pressure", the biggest class had only 220 students. He felt that it is "just possible" that his department might have to implement some restrictions on enrolment if forced by budgetary constraints, but he did not foresee it happening in the near future.

Borovoy attacks PM on RCMP

By CELIA RASBACH

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's statements on the current rash of allegations and revelations concerning R.C.M.P. lawbreaking have turned a serious situation into a crisis, said Alan Borovoy, Director of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA). Speaking at Woodsworth College Wednesday on "Civil Liberties and the R.C.M.P.," Borovoy charged that Trudeau has created an "aura of legitimacy around the notion of police lawbreaking."

Borovoy criticized Trudeau's concept of ministerial responsibility. The R.C.M.P. Act puts the Mounties under the Solicitor-General's jurisdiction, he said. How can he take responsibility for an organization he knows nothing about? Yet now Trudeau says that ministers should not interfere with the R.C.M.P., Borovoy stated.

Trudeau shows "disquieting naivete" if he believes that special precautions are not necessary to ensure that the R.C.M.P. are obeying the law, Borovoy said.

Trudeau's claim that he would no more think of taking special precautions with the R.C.M.P. than with the maids at 24 Sussex Drive does not take into consideration a security organization's "propensity to use unorthodox methods and take shortcuts" to achieve its ends, he asserted.

Borovoy also attacked Trudeau statements about permissible technical breaches of the law. According to Trudeau, a policeman must sometimes break the speed limit to catch a criminal. But, Borovoy said, there is no analogy between serious crimes like burglary and theft, and a traffic violation.

Borovoy suggested that the government in future investigate and prosecute possible acts of R.C.M.P. law-breaking, and hand over to the provincial Attorneys-General all evidence of police lawbreaking that falls under provincial jurisdiction. He also said a Parliamentary Committee should be set up to investigate the problem of ministerial responsibility and that Trudeau should correct statements he has made so far.

After accusations by a member of the audience that Borovoy had taken Trudeau's remarks out of context, Borovoy said that Trudeau had confirmed these statements in letters to the CCLA.

Rink plans shelved this year

By DAVID ZELDIN

Plans to erect an ice rink on the back campus playing fields this winter had to be cancelled due to delay in preparations, according to Mike Scott, Students' Administrative Council (SAC) Services Commission Assistant.

The idea of a rink, originally thought of by Sandy Henderson of the Intramural Department as a community volunteer effort with some of the college councils, was taken up by SAC which wanted to have a rink during winter for events such as Broomball tournaments and Friday evening skating parties.

However, the proposal was not submitted to the Internal Affairs Committee of Governing Council till December 1, 1977. The late date, according to Scott, is why the rink could not be built.

"By the time we were in a position to push on it, it was the end of the first week in January. (By that time) we could only do a partial effort because it would take systematic organization to undertake the project."

The main difficulty lay in finding a contractor to put up the rink and maintain it, since SAC wanted a professional job. The U of T Physical Plant claimed that "it does not have the manpower to erect the rink and do the necessary maintenance."

"At that date it was better not to do it at all. We didn't want to get in trouble for a botched job from council or from the consumers," Scott said.

Another problem was the possibility of damage to the field. E.A.N. Prichard, manager of operations and maintenance for Building Fabric and Grounds, advised in a letter to Lois Reimer of Internal Affairs that "it may not be possible to restore the damaged area within the funds available to us," because winter kill and damage to the fields during the past football season which was particularly wet will make Physical Plant's job difficult enough.

SAC was planning to go ahead with the rink despite Prichard's advice because it thought that risk to the grounds could be partly avoided by closing the field off before the thaw and putting up fences to prevent people from walking on it. However, it was the lack of time which ultimately stopped SAC from going ahead with plans.

Scott says that next year SAC will try again to build a rink.

Sadat's moves PR: Israeli MP

By JOHN CURTIN

Anwar Sadat's symbolic gestures of peace have greatly endangered and "boxed Israel into a public relations corner," charged Jacob Barmore, Minister without Portfolio of the Israel Knesset.

Describing the talk surrounding the Egyptian president's visit to Israel as "myth" and "fairytale", Barmore said last Tuesday at Hart House that the visit was calculated to be significant to the world audience, but not to Israelis.

While refusing to speculate on the future, Barmore warned that "history is not charitable to sensational events. For a visit to be revolutionary it must change something. This one changed nothing; it was words, words, empty words."

Barmore said that the traumatic history of the Jews shows just how unrealistic it is to expect Israel to base its security on "the whims of a leader who may change tomorrow."

"When people claim that Israel is a product of the UN we laugh in their face," said Barmore. "We are a product of our own sweat and blood." Sadat's post-facto recognition of Israel is now seen as an empty gesture in view of his recent heaping of insults and indignities on Israel," he added. "If we had to depend on the recognition of Sadat we would be in a sad state."

The Israeli Minister suggested that the world speak less about the spectacle of Sadat's visit and more about the components of the conflict. He said that Sadat's address to the Knesset last November totally disregarded Israel's position. Barmore pointed out that the occupied territories are not a manifestation of an Israeli expansionist policy but the direct result of her right to defend herself against Arab aggression.

Barmore was enthused with the idea of both Israelis and Egyptians living and working together in the Sinai but was disappointed by Sadat's lack of initiative in this area. "Let them (the two nations) get to know and recognize each other, together change desolate desert into fertile ground and participate in a human venture where the Sinai would serve as a testing ground for Sadat's promises," he said.

The Minister showed that the Israelis back their government's present policy by citing a plebiscite taken only three days ago, showing that 91 percent of the Israelis rejected withdrawal from all captured lands and 74 percent want Israel in the Sinai.

Editors talk about journalism at Innis

By PETER HOHENADEL

Magazine editor Alexander Ross said yesterday that magazines are one of the few growth industries in Canada. He said that Canada is now enjoying an explosion of new magazines.

Speaking at Innis College with three other leading magazine editors, Ross attributed the expansion in part to recent government legislation reversing the tax advantages Canadian advertisers had gained from advertising in American magazines. Since that time, magazines like Time and Reader's Digest have suffered declining circulation in Canada, Ross said.

Ross, Editor of Canadian Business, also cited the increasing power of advertising in magazines as a reason for this expansion. With more than 17 television channels now available to Toronto viewers, he speculated that advertisers are uneasy about their ability to reach a mass audience. According to Ross, the paid circulation of magazines is not subject to this uncertainty.

Don Obe, who recently resigned as Editor of The Canadian, said, "A magazine's first duty is to be read." Obe said that although a magazine has a responsibility to accurately inform the public on relevant national issues, "we have to appeal to the advertisers. That's what we live and die by."

John Gault, a senior editor at Macleans, disagreed with Obe about the responsibility of the press. "Any publication has no ties whatsoever with government policy. I personally couldn't care less if the country stays together," he said. "Most of us are more committed to the craft (of journalism) than we are to ideology."

Each editor was asked to define the relation of the press to its public. Gault said simply, "Our responsibility to the public is to inform." Obe added that the press should "cut through all the hype and sham that surrounds every person and event in the public eye." He cited the lawsuit Otto Lang brought against The Canadian as an important test of the press' right to inform the public of their view of the truth.

Douglas Marshall, Editor of Books in Canada, said that the function of his magazine is to "show people how to use the language, before it's too late."

ELECTION ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

• FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

Students: Seats available - 2 in each of Victoria, Trinity, New, Erindale Colleges

The doors of tradition will not be smashed.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. MORE CUTBACKS

Cutbacks strike again.

ECO 100, a first year economics course which is a prerequisite for a degree in Commerce, Political Economy and Economics, will be restricted as early as next September to entering students with an average of 80 percent in Grade XIII. According to the Office of Admissions and Awards this move is unprecedented. The restriction may well reduce enrollment in ECO 100 and Com 100 by about a third.

The reason given for the decision is that the Political Economy department faces a diminishing budget and an increasing influx of students. Political Economy Chairman Ian Drummond also said that the move is a way to "release staff resources for upper-level work."

We have here on the one hand, an attempt to rationalize cutbacks and on the other, a departmental restructuring aimed at increasing the department's chances of getting funding. Both aims are being served at the expense of students.

As far as cutbacks go, the restriction on enrollment will only serve to give the impression that cutbacks can be absorbed and lived with: all one has to do is keep some students out of the university. Exactly the same thing as with English testing. In both cases the government wins: it gives less money to the universities and cuts the number of students going to university. Instead of unemployed university graduates Ontario will have unemployed high school students.

Releasing teaching staff to do "upper-level" work is consistent with U of T's aim to get government funding on the basis of "quality", a policy which represents another attempt to absorb cutbacks.

This is the kind of thing that we can expect to happen more often in the future. As the competition gets worse and worse, we will see more departments scrambling to beef their research at the expense of teaching.

Cutbacks won't go away by themselves. They have to be fought.

Strand, nor was an old Vic tradition — The Bob Revue.

Sure, "A University community is composed of individuals with thinking minds" but all minds need a rest and all 'minds' do more than just sit and think.

You say, you do not deny 'news of the factual kind' yet their coverage is hardly negligible. Your emphasis needs shifting.

Is the purpose of the Strand to be an elitist and narrow literary magazine delving into the nuances of Mike McVean's weekends or is it to be the voice of the Vic community answering questions as to what is going on in Victoria government affairs, Vic college sports and Victoria community activity? It is inexcusable to bypass Vic student submissions in favour of those no longer attending this university. Someone is obviously under a misconception and I fear it is the Strand editors.

Sex for grades

I found the article by George Cook in the January 18 issue to be both offensive and misleading. Sex for grades, or evaluations, is neither a humorous subject nor something the University of Toronto has to import. It is a problem that Teaching Assistants and students alike face daily, either in the form of outright sexual proposition or in the equally odious form of discriminatory evaluation because of gender.

Factors contributing to this problem are: 1) it is nearly impossible to prove that you have been propositioned and/or unfairly evaluated, 2) a person who complains is severely ridiculed by the Faculty, the University Administration, friends, family and the press (as exemplified by the article in question), and 3) in many cases, the offender holds nearly complete control over the persons academic and professional career.

The Graduate Assistants Association has, in its current contract negotiations, attempted to ameliorate this problem by demanding that TA's performance evaluations be grievable. The University has, however, refused to concede to this demand, responding, in part, that it was a non-issue because they had received no complaints.

In spite of the University Administration's refusal to recognize this as a significant, though formally hidden, problem, the Faculty's generally parsimonious ignorance of its occurrence, and the presses attempts to capitalize on it as vulgar humor, the problem continues to exist and effect the lives of many U of T students yearly. It is a problem that should be condemned, not ignored or ridiculed, a problem I hope the Varsity and other campus newspapers will join the GAA in exposing and eliminating.

Strand elitist

Open letter to the Strand Editors:

Running a newspaper is no easy task, I realize and I don't like to complain but I really feel you have the position of the Strand confused.

The Strand is a newspaper, not a magazine. It should reflect and report 'the Life and Times of Victoria'. As far as being a source for student literature that role belongs to ACTA, Vic's magazine.

I feel the Strand has an important role to play in Vic's community. Apathy is easily contracted when people don't know what's going on. So much that is important to the perpetuation and inspiration of a Vic community is lightly touched upon and let go as the 'Last Detail', when it should be the heart of the paper. Human events, day to day happenings such as were reported last year, for example, Sue in a bunny suit at Pratt, are of interest and help to build a sense of community. Cutbacks are affecting the entire university, and have now struck the Review. This week we had to cut back on the number of stories run, cut out all our photos, cutback on the size of our headlines, and now we have to cutback on our readers, and that means you! Put this paper down. Turn around, Walk away, and do not look back.

Two views of Apartheid

Siswe Bansi is dead...

The facts about apartheid in South Africa horrify whenever one reads them, but facts are easily forgotten, tending to reach the head, not the heart. In their attempts to show the realities of life in South Africa, playwrights Athol Fugard, John Kani and Winston Ntshona wisely ignored a dogmatic, factual approach, and have instead given us a simple, very moving drama: Siswe Bansi is Dead.

The plot concerns one Siswe Bansi, a man who naively left his wife and family in Williamsburg, to travel to Port Elizabeth to search for work. Bansi has been stopped by the police and his passbook has been found wanting of the official stamp which allows blacks to be in white areas. He has been given seventy-two hours to leave, but his time is up and he is still in Port Elizabeth, bewildered, frightened of the immediate imprisonment to which he is subject when the police find him, yet doggedly determined to try and find a job.

Bansi goes to stay with a man named Buntu, a man hardened enough to function well in a white man's city. Buntu, with his insight and ironic wit tries to explain to Bansi the realities of his position as interloper in a white man's country and the dangers of his immediate position. Buntu finishes by stating that the only time a black man in South Africa is happy is when he is either drunk or dead.

The two are merrily returning home after a drinking spree when they find a dead man in an alley. Buntu thinks it wisest to run away. Bansi thinks someone should be told about it — they end up taking the dead man's passbook. At home, Buntu suggests that the only possible way out of Bansi's predicament is to change pictures with the dead man, using his valid influx stamp to both find work and elude arrest, at least for the time being.

Having nothing, Bansi is unwilling to lose his name, and equally unwilling to take the dead man's — to become a "ghost". Buntu points out that a black in South Africa is always a ghost, always less than a man, that Bansi is no worse off with a dead man's name, and has at least a chance to get a job.

Reluctantly, Bansi agrees to take the passbook, swallowing his pride and risking long imprisonment for the crime of using another man's papers. Bansi, an intensely honest man has now committed a crime, and for small gain — no money, no glory, no power, merely the possibility of leading a decent life. The results of the "death of Siswe Bansi" are apparent as he goes to the photographer, Styles, to have his picture taken for his wife. Bansi is clad in a new suit (bought with the dead man's paycheck), with a valid work permit and a job, and is finally able to smile wholeheartedly for the photographer. The smile says, "I have pulled the wool over the white man's eyes, I am alive, I am a man."

The acting in the play is excellent. Alton Kumalo energetically plays both Styles and Buntu and is an excellent foil for the passive Bansi. He does some excellent soliloquies — my favorite being how, as Styles, he got a family of twenty-seven to smile for a group picture by having them say "cheese". Smiling is so rare among the blacks in South Africa, he tells us, that the noise of the family became contagious until everyone on the street was smiling and saying "cheese".

Errol Slue is beautifully restrained as Siswe Bansi, showing no anger, just a deep sadness and an inability to understand why he is not treated as a man.

The play is good, and simple, and gentle — and it kicks you squarely in the stomach. It is a devastating indictment of apartheid, and more than that, a damnation of any oppressive regime that denies human rights and dignity. Oppressed people of the world, say "cheese".

Joanna Kidd

...oppression lives on

When Earl Butz then U.S. Secretary of Agriculture made his infamous statements about blacks, the producers of Two Faces of Africa must have been listening in. The musical went out of its way to portray blacks as happy manual workers, stupid savage idiots and lustful studs and sluts. Sound like a familiar stereotype? The show was clearly racist and sexist and the only thing that kept me from walking out was my unfortunate duty to review this gross travesty.

On the technical side, the show featured Pierre Cardin-looking tribal costumes, disco-style dancing and even big band music a la Glen Miller. When traditional culture was highlighted it was generally buried, twisted or tainted by this up-tempo Broadway-style production.

The plot, set at the intellectual level of Mr. Dress-up concerned Lulu, played by Ursuline Kairson, a young woman growing up and learning to adjust to the realities of the new Africa while worrying her mother, played by Zaggati Pilaso, because of her supposedly liberal lifestyle. Throughout the show the blacks learn to accept their fate, making the best of what they have and being happy that while they have lost everything else, they at least are able to retain their heritage. In the end they discover Jesus, "look up for love" and set about to pray their way to a better life.

Throughout the show narrators make unexplained references to Uganda, the PLO, Belfast, Biko, Soweto, and Mozambique. And they remind us that South Africa has its own unique dilemma suggesting that the rest of us mind our own business.

All in all, Two Faces of Africa suggests that Vorster has nothing to worry about from the blacks of South Africa. They are happy inmates who hope for change, but are not about to revolt to bring about such change. At worst they might try and pray their enemy to death.

Thus, the show obviously avoids any mention of possible widespread dissent or, heaven forbid, revolution by the happy blacks of this sunny land. It does this by peddling native black South African culture as being largely passive and geared to accepting oppression and keep on smiling. Who are they trying to kid? And what do they think liberation movements like SWAPO and ZANU are up to, dancing their way to freedom? The production implies that we are all brothers and sisters and hints that we really shouldn't go around taking angry shots at each other. I guess that is simply not a civilized manner of solving our problems. Whatever the case the fighting actions of the South African blacks stand in stark contrast to the passive people who boogie their way to oblivion on the stage of the O'Keefe Centre.

And therein lies the greatest sin of Two Faces of Africa. Not only does it lie about the past and present, but it dares to portray a future of happy whites oppressing happy blacks. In this respect the show belongs in fantasyland but in fact it points to a hell that is all too real.

Sebastiane: gay film proves tedious

It's 304 AD. The Emperor Diocletian is well into his dotage and has ordered his slaves to snap the necks and chew all Christians within grappling distance. Christians are popping up everywhere. Even his pet boy Sebastian turns out to be one. And out on the frontier, life is tough. The barbarians aren't due for another century or so. The wine tastes of urine. The rations are short and putrifying. The boys haven't seen a woman or a public execution for a dog's age. Their only amusements are wrestling, swordplay, and tossing around something that might be a discus but looks suspiciously like a gilt-edged frisbee. And what does the Emperor send as a solstice present? You guessed it folks, a Christian, in fact the self-same Sebastian.

Sebastian has managed to fascinate the Catholic Church, Renaissance painters, Debussy, d'Annunzio, and Yukio Mishima but the boys at the outpost aren't thrilled.

The new boy spends most of his time staring at the sun, refusing to take part in sword drills, and playing wet blanket. Life without women being what it is, however, the lithe young doughty boy does manage to fire the less-than-latent lusts of his brooding commander Severus. As these desires are thwarted by Sebastian, whose only passion is for a god which might be Christian but who appears, in the boy's imagination, to be a wet dream of Apollo in his sun-god avatar, the centurion spends most of his days torturing the object of his affections. The remainder of the cohort (with one exception) aid, abet and go on as they have.

Eventually, as all readers of Lives of the Saints know, Sebastian becomes the human pin-cushion, a martyr, and the patron saint (despite Mother Church's best efforts) of male homosexuals.

Even this sketch should serve to indicate the possibilities Derek Jarman (who co-wrote and co-directed) could have explored in Sebastiane. Men without women, power structures in small groups, the results of extended isolation in godforsaken places, soldiers in a crumbling culture — any one of these would have proved a suitable focus for the film. And a film concerning itself with early Christianity, its nature and effects could have been fascinating.

Jarman has, however, chosen to waffle and to fail to the temptation to confront the audience with a speciously "frank and matter of fact" treatment of homosexuality. The sexual implications of the St. Sebastian story are clearly what led the film-maker to his subject. Sebastian's view of God is sexually charged. He speaks of the caresses of the deity, and of his (the god is clearly male) golden body. The soldiers at the outpost are all involved in homosexual relations, either through personal preference or through force of circumstance. And it is sexual jealousy which is the real cause of the saint-to-be's martyrdom. For Severus his beloved's religion is important only if it is the basis of Sebastian's constant refusals.

It may seem narrow of me to note that this does not strike as the most interesting aspect of the story, and that it would not be my choice for the film's central theme. It would, however, be laudable if Jarman could have forgotten his audience for a moment and made an authentically honest film on the subject. There is no love-making in the film. And there is a good deal of tease involved in the vauntedly unabashed full frontal nudity. The camera is continually running down a tanned torso to just below the waist and then stopping. It may be that cameras are more modest in their gazes than human beings but this does seem a difficulty which might have been combatted, were the film-makers' claims to honesty justified. As it is we see a good deal of shoulder, lotsa leg, and a bushel of buttock but not much else, unless its hiding in the shadows.

One might also note that the one "love" scene, a long, slow-motion, supposedly lyrical encounter between two of the soldiers, is so matter-of-factly observed that it bears a disquieting resemblance to an old Zest commercial. If anyone dared photograph a heterosexual love scene in that manner he or she would be laughed out of the business. It would seem that we're being hyped.

Yet it is to this avowed ideal that character, human interaction, and thematic clarity are sacrificed. This sort of disproportion runs through the film. The decision to have the dialogue in Latin results in a sort of eclect but it limits the actors' abilities to portray emotion to such an extent that it doesn't seem worth the trouble. They look for all the world like my grade 12 Latin class trying to read Catullus and mean it.

The film was made on a tiny budget and at least some of its problems would have been solved by liberal applications of money and time. Jarman and his associates do have talent and perhaps the only impetus a film-goer should feel to attend Sebastiane (unless 85 minutes of tanned skin is your idea of an ideal aesthetic experience) is the thought that even a marginal success will open up the gates to financing. And rumour has it that Jarman is now worrying over the pronunciation of Ancient Egyptian.

Kuerti's Scriabin a revelation

Anton Kuerti's popularity was quite evident in the enthusiastic response of a near-capacity audience at Massey Hall last Saturday night. Beginning with the Beethoven sonata Op. 14 No. 2 in G major, Kuerti brought a light, nimble touch to the outer movements, although I felt that his treatment of the ironically simple middle variation movement was a difficult. This was a Kuerti performance through and through, replete with jumps and gestures at appropriate points — such as the "surprise" chord at the end of the second movement, and the capricious machinations of the hybrid Scherzo-Rondo movement. Fortunately, Kuerti took the final movement at a reasonable tempo, heeding Beethoven's injunction to play "allegro assai."

The same caution might well have been applied to the succeeding work, the Carnaval of Robert Schumann. I felt that at times the work became more Kuerti's than Schumann's — in Kuerti's hands, the miniature character pieces sometimes threatened to become caricatures. Not only did the performer plow through the opening Preamble at break-neck speed, but he also insisted upon making erratic and disturbing tempo changes in some of the slower pieces, such as the "Valse noble". "Papillons" was taken a touch too quickly for my taste, although its fleeting nature was caught so well that I almost missed the underpinning horn-calls in the left-hand part. I cannot quarrel with the technical brilliance and panache of the virtuoso piece of the set, "Paganini", although even here, its forlorn little "Valse allemand" was taken at a tempo fast enough to frustrate any respectable waltzer. All in all, though we were given a refreshing performance of this oft-heard work, although I feel sometimes Schumann's musical intentions were sacrificed for interpretative novelty.

The second half of the program featured works by Grieg, Mendelssohn and Scriabin. The three pieces by Grieg were played with suitable charm and lyricism, and all save one were relatively unfamiliar comers to the concert stage. The same goes for the Mendelssohn Scherzo a capriccio, a dazzling virtuoso showpiece that provided a vehicle for Kuerti's technical fireworks.

The high point of the program was the concluding Etudes, Op. 8 of Scriabin. Not only do these pieces bristle with the sharps and flats of a late Romantic chromatic vocabulary gone wild, they also display a rhythmic complexity and delicacy of tonal shadings that Kuerti seems to be able to capture every time. Needless to say, Kuerti's technical brilliance remained up to scratch in studies marked characteristically Tempestuoso and Brio, and he brought a special luxuriance to the sensuous shifting harmonies of the eighth etude. This was superlative Scriabin — Kuerti forcefully brought out the contrasts within the set, from the dynamic ballade-style of the ninth study to the lighter touch of the sixth Con grazia etude. It was the balance of technical control and musical flexibility that made the Scriabin set the high point of the program, and if there's any more of Kuerti's Scriabin to be had at future concerts this listener shall surely want to attend.

How to talk about drinking & driving to your teenagers

We all know going out is fun, and no parent wants to take away those good times. But these days, with teenagers in and out of cars so much, it's crucial that they understand the dangers of drinking and driving, and that they can avert potential trouble by making the right decisions.

First, set your son or daughter straight on this often-misunderstood fact: beer, wine and spirits—in excess, all three are just as dangerous on the road.

A good way of avoiding trouble is to plan ahead. Suggest that your teenagers review their evening before going out. If they see drinking involved, far better to leave the car at home than to take chances later behind the wheel.

Far better also to say no to a drink, to refuse to drive, or to turn down a lift with an impaired friend than to go along with the crowd and maybe regret it.

You can support your teenagers and give them confidence by letting them know that if they ever need help you'll go for them, pay their cab or do whatever is necessary to get them home safely.

Most important, be a good example. Never drive if you've had even one drink too many. Better still, don't let it come to that. Know your limit and stay within it.

to your parents

If you're not of legal drinking age, don't touch a drop. But if you are, and you drive, then you're old enough to do your part in reaching an agreement with your parents on the subject.

Sure they worry. Because even if you don't drink, others in your group may. The friend driving you home one night may have had too much.

Show that you're equally concerned. Get serious. For instance, what have you read lately about the dangers of drinking and driving? Do you know how much beer, wine or spirits your body can safely handle before your judgment becomes impaired? Do you know the law in your province? And what happens if you break it?

Get the facts and discuss them calmly. Then take the initiative and propose a few family ground rules.

No driving if you've been drinking beyond your limit. (We'll send you a valuable free chart on responsible limits if you write us.) No riding with a friend who's been drinking. And convince your parents if a situation ever turns dicey, you won't hesitate to phone for help.

Finally, remind your parents you're concerned for their safety, too, and that the family rules on drinking and driving apply to them, as well.

Complex film obscure

If you enjoy exercises in obfuscation then Joseph Losey's Mr. Klein may be the film for you.

It is about an art collector who lives in Nazi occupied Paris, named Robert Klein. He is a Catholic from the German speaking Alsace region in France. He is also, according to the publicity handout, "charming, cultivated and ruthless". Actually it is just Alain Delon looking like a bored and bewildered Tony Curtis.

There exists another Robert Klein, a Jew (whom one never sees). The day that the Catholic Robert Klein finds out about him is the day that he is first mistaken for him.

The film is loaded down with some weighty ironies. In an early scene, the Catholic Robert Klein is bargaining with a Jew who is trying to sell a painting — presumably to raise money for an escape. At the end of the film, when they find themselves on the same train heading for a concentration camp, this conversation is reproduced on the soundtrack.

Joseph Losey is so determined to have his hero meet his final Kafkaesque destiny that you can feel him wrench the plot arbitrarily into place.

The atmosphere of foreboding and mystery which pervades the film is not derived from any complexities of plot or situation but from the fact that so much is deliberately withheld from the audience. Any ambiguity is achieved in the same way. When the Catholic Mr. Klein assumes that the other Klein is dead, because of something he reads in the newspaper, we don't see the article. We don't understand what made Klein assume he was dead since in the next scene he is discovered to be alive again.

The audience is not allowed to discover anything in this film; everything is diagrammed for them. One of the most unbelievable and abstruse scenes involves a nightclub act. In it, a woman in black sings in an excruciating funeral manner, while a blonde girl and a man dressed as a gross travesty of an orthodox Jew cavort in front of her. The patrons of the nightclub appear to find this act incredibly funny. Presumably this is meant to be an illustration of French hatred for the Jews. But "meant to be" is all it is. No reasons for their hatred (or for anything else) are offered or revealed. Are the French meant to be innately nasty Jew hating types? This is hardly the kind of explanation one expects from a director with Losey's intellectual pretensions.

Perhaps the actors are to blame. Only when the police come to confiscate the Catholic Klein's art treasures, does Alain Delon appear animated. However two friends who are also on the scene (his lawyer and his lawyer's wife) do not seem surprised at these events; in fact they seem puzzled that their friend is upset. It is hard to know in what context their actions are supposed to be viewed: are they trying to give the impression of perfect savoir faire? Are they secretly in a plot to get rid of their friend so that they can profit from the sale of his art treasures? Or are they merely bad actors? These are the sort of questions this film raises.

It is all very tastefully done, but that is exactly what is wrong with the picture. Anti-semitism, Nazism, alienation are so tastefully depicted that Losey's message, whatever it is, doesn't come through. In the words of Pauline Kael: "Good taste is the last refuge of the middlebrow."

to be expensive...

If we were an ordinary store, we'd sell Polaroid, Mix-it, Yamaha, Sanyo etc.
Instead we've made it into a business in Harman/Kardon, Laurson, and DENON.

The result: the finest equipment available at reasonable prices.
If you're seriously interested in a sound system, you should have us go to every corner of Toronto. Within the downtown community as a whole that offers top service, technical advice, and most important, great prices.
Come down for us, and see more in the Colonnade 101 Bloor

Ballet Troupe matures

Six years after its formation, Toronto-based Ballet Ys has reached adulthood and is showing only a few bothersome traces of adolescence. The company is currently appearing at St. Paul's Centre on Avenue Road and a few changes in structure and program have given this small, contemporary troupe a newly mature, albeit unbalanced, artistic profile.

Ballet Ys now has eight dancers, two more than it had when it last performed on a Toronto stage just over a year ago. That was the MacMillan Theatre and the Company didn't fill its stage half as well as it does St. Paul's.

The highlight of the evening is Artistic Director Gloria Grant's Picnic on the Battlefield, a see-sawing tragic-comedy based on a work by absurdist playwright Fernando Arrabal. In it a young soldier's parents arrive on an active battlefield to have a family picnic. Their behaviour is peculiarly detached and insensitive, they are completely oblivious to the combat surrounding them.

It's that kind of whimsical, incongruous tale. Grant's soundly connected choreography carries it along swiftly and John Lang's jazz-rock score further enlivens the work by establishing additional ironies between the music and action.

Unfortunately Carina Bomers as the mother looks ridiculously too young to have a son of soldiering age. Despite this she dances the role with keen understanding as do all the other dancers in their respective parts. They seem to have captured the eccentric mood of the piece. There is in fact only one irritation about Picnic on the Battlefield. It is not the kind of subject matter that is relevant to the materialistic and self-preoccupied disco generation of the late seventies but instead, would have struck a warmer chord during the war protest movement of the late sixties-early seventies. It's as potentially insane as America's Archie Bunkers, surrounded by a six-pack and chips, watching the horrors of My Lai on the television.

Grant's work is however more satisfying than the four other compositions on Ys' program because it alone is able, for various reasons, to establish and successfully develop its chosen theme.

David Hatch Walker's Ecstasies, while every bit as ambitious and major a work, is only superficially pleasing. Six dancers dressed in white glide in and out of various associations and around a central, female archangel figure, celebrating the celestial state to a hymn by Alan Hovanhaness. Marnie Cooke's dancing of this core role is graceful and precise but she lacks the definition and dramatic expression which can comfortably transmit joyous piety to an audience in as close proximity to the stage as that of St. Paul's Centre.

For optimum visual effect Ecstasies should be performed at a much greater distance from the audience. Nevertheless the whole Company does justice to Walker's simple, pure lines.

In contrast, Cooke and partner Keith Urban stumble miserably through Anna Blewcham's Fata Morgana. Based on a valid and intriguing concept, Fata Morgana succeeds only in being trite and underdeveloped. But it's impossible to determine whether the blame for this lies with Blewcham or the dancers.

Left unexplained, Cooke and Urban's frustrated antics don't appear as though they comprehend the dialectic between themselves and their drawings of Blewcham's cerebral barriers through mime is painfully clumsy.

Unfortunately, in James Kudelka's Sheet! Kathleen Trick and Richard Sugarman haven't mastered Kudelka's acrobatic choreography which goes begging for a more fluid execution but they convey the work's exuberant feelings expertly. While they give us an inkling of the kind of flash and electricity that this piece could have with time and practice, they are unable to whip it as to a peak due to a lack of precision in their dancing. The sheet, which is a symbol of their connubial state and is used to toss, nudge and tease, could similarly use a few more hours of rehearsal.

Also on the program is Gail Benn's All That Wasted Shame, an overwhelmingly static piece describing a woman's three clinched views of herself. It should never have left the studio, so do us a favour Ys and bury it.

Kristine King

Tremblay's St. Carmen

A new Michel Tremblay play is certain to be a theatrical event. St. Carmen of the Main, enjoying a superb staging at the Tarragon, is tough social and political comment, concentrated in the fable of a C&W singer's apotheosis in a sleazy Montreal nightclub.

Night on the Main, the city's equivalent to our own Strip. The punks, pimps and junkies lurk in windows, vague in outline, amorphous. They are waiting to welcome Carmen back from Nashville, where she has perfected a new repertoire. Only two denizens of this underground hate her — Gloria, whose career she shattered, and the mysteriously humiliated Toothpick, who has been doing club owner Maurice's dirty work. Carmen, trying to ennoble the refugees from life who are her supplicants, presents to them their own feelings and aspirations, pronounces them worthwhile, and is felled by a shotgun blast from Toothpick. Thus is secured perpetual degradation for the Main's inhabitants and Maurice's continuing prosperity.

The play can be read either as political allegory or as a reminder of the despair to be found nightly in the Brunswick or Selby hotels. St. Carmen features smouldering acting from Brenda Donohue and fine supporting roles. The dialogue is B-movie grade, but invested with intensity enough to enmesh the viewer. Tremblay parallels the classical unities of the Greek tragedies, and his play works very well as the depiction of misery of a group, not an individual. It is superior Canadian work easily capable of going abroad.

Buffalo Phil back on top

Michael Tilson Thomas drew an exceptionally warm response from the audience at Massey Hall by proving beyond a doubt that, under his baton, the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra has rejoined the sacred ranks of the virtuoso orchestras. The program selected for their tour is of incredible difficulty — the Ives and Bartok compositions have probably been responsible for many a conductor's nightmares. However, by the several outstanding performances heard Tuesday evening, it is obvious that Thomas has a well-founded confidence in his players.

Ives' Decoration Day proved an excellent opener for the program. The contrasts between the exhilaration of the holiday and the sombre decorating of the graves are central to Ives' conception of the work and Thomas showed his skill at both ends of the scale. The orchestra performed with astounding control from beginning to end, particularly at the playing of "Taps" amidst murmuring strings and distant bells, and yet it could let loose with all the fury appropriate to the clash of the marching bands.

From a technical standpoint, Bartok's Miraculous Mandarin Suite is an equally frightening piece. Generally, it lacked the subtlety of detail displayed in the other two selections, but was effective nonetheless. The Suite is too explicitly programmatic to be totally successful in concert and, consequently, everyone's concentration seemed to lag at points, especially during the prolonged dance of enticement. The clarinet solo, which recurs throughout the suite as the seduction motif, sadly lacked the essential sensuality, but the trumpet solo near the end was brilliant. Overall, a somewhat brittle interpretation.

The true expressive range of the Buffalo Philharmonic came into focus, in Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. The phrasings were occasionally clipped in the first movement, but for the most part Thomas exhibited the careful attention to detail necessary to save this work from wallowing in its rather overdone romanticism. The endless tempo changes were smoothly handled, although the fourth movement began to "run away" from Thomas slightly as it gained momentum.

Again, the clarinet solos were disappointing, but were more than made up for in the numerous superb solos in the other wind instruments. Largely through the exquisite performance of the French horn player, the second movement became a section of true beauty (no matter how many times one might have heard it before).

dance

Tonight and tomorrow are the last opportunities to catch Ballet Ys' major effort at St. Paul's Theatre, 121 Avenue Road. There are five dances from five different choreographers. 8 p.m. Students and seniors $3. Adults $4.50. Call the Ys Studio for info: 364-3428.

Also on stage tonight at 7:30 p.m. is a modern troupe from Montreal with an excellent reputation, Entre-Six, premiering 4 works. Toccata, Nonetto and En Proximities is by dance-maker Murray Louis to music by Brahms. Louis has his own company in New York and is coming up for the premiere. There's also a show same time tomorrow night.

Saturday afternoon at 2 p.m. Entre-Six presents "More Than Just Elephants", three works from their children's repertoire. Adults $5. Under 18ers $3. Young People's Theatre Centre, 165 Front Street East. Box Office: 864-9732.

The O'Keefe Centre (who else?) plays host to the Folklorico Ballet Tancatuh De Mexico next Tuesday through Saturday at 8 p.m. There are matinees at 2 p.m. on both Wed. and Sat. They promise, according to the press release, ahem, "gorgeous girls and little heel-clacking men." How kinky. Shouldn't someone call in the Morality Squad — this could be the biggest bust since the raid at The Body Politic. Tickets from $3.50 to $10. Information: 363-6633.

We're getting closer to The National Ballet of Canada's mammoth spring season, February 8 through March 11 at the O'Keefe Centre. There's so much on the program one doesn't know where to begin. Highly recommended are La Fille Mal Gardée, the mixed evenings which include Frederick Ashton's The Dream and Romeo and Juliet. Veronica Tennant, back performing after a year's absence, dances Juliet against Peter Schaufuss' Romeo on two occasions. It's best to get tickets early, in spite of high prices they go quickly. See the National's ads in the weekend papers or call the O'Keefe: 363-6633. (Tickets are also available at major ticket agencies.)

Hello Jazz Fans! This week's big event happens on Wednesday Feb. 1st when Buddy Rich brings his big band into Minkler Auditorium for a one night bandstand. Buddy has been termed the greatest drummer ever; he's certainly one of the few with perfect rhythm, namely the ability to recall the exact tempo of every tune he's ever performed. Call 491-8877 for information and reservations. Tickets $7, and apparently there aren't many left.

At the clubs: Eddie Daniels plays sax and flute to close off the week at Bourbon Street. Next week brings in the man whom Jeff Egner considers the finest saxophonist alive today: Zoot Sims. For swinging jazz in the Lester Young tradition, he's the absolute best, and a good bet for the non-jazz enthusiast.

At George's, Eugene Amaro finishes off the week; he's always a good bet. Swinging Shepherd Moe Koffman comes in Monday with his superb quintet.

Cafe Soho, the dream club come true of manager Frank Houchen, features the Ira Cohen Quartet this weekend after hours. On Thursday, Jim Doney (bass) and his band will start a three day gig of modern creative jazz after hours. Despite being a cardio-vascular surgeon at the Toronto General Hospital, Jim has never learned how to show up on time — but when he does it's all worth while.

Hart House presents Graham Card in the Wednesday noon hour free concert. I suspect that Mr. Card plays the guitar.

The Sam Noto Quintet entertains tomorrow afternoon at Stop 33 in the Sutton Place. The Maury Kaye Quintet plays at the same time in the Copper Lounge of the Inn on the Park.

And now, the Dixieland listings: Dr. McJazz as per usual at the Brunswick, the Climax Jazz Band at Zeld's Thursday through Saturday, John Arpin at the Chelsea Bun. On Saturday afternoon, the Excelsior Jazz Band at the Ports, Dr. McJazz at the Chelsea Bun, the Metro Stompers at Chez Moi. Sunday features the Excelsior Jazz Band at Harborfront. bob

movies

Friday: Short and sweet. At the New Yorker from now 'til never is Sebastiane. Some people think it's better than our reviewer does but I don't know why. The Revue mounts what has to be the silliest pairing in some time Henry King's remarkable 1939 version of Jesse James and Mel Brooks' appalling 1974 hash of Young Frankenstein. Cinema Lumiere has more Brooks with The Producers and Woody Allen's Play It Again Sam. At Scar tonight and Med. Sci tomorrow Cinema Gratis is offering Straw Dogs and Kelly's Heroes. The kind folks at U of T Films have Straw Dogs too (though why they expect anyone to pay when it's free next door I don't know) and Midnight Cowboy. And The Science Centre, as consistent as ever has the best show in town with the 1934 version of Great Expectations.

Saturday: The Revue starts a run of Spirit of the Beehive (which, if nothing else shows how far wrong most people are about the power of the Frankenstein legend) and Chac (which is about Mayan religion and sounds worth the trip out to Roncesvalles). Otherwise no change.

Sunday: The AGO's series of American Melodramas unearths Ruby Gentry and Forty Guns. At Innis the shows of cartoons continue at 2:00 and 4:30 while later in the evening they offer a four hour marathon of silent shorts which they promise will cure any somnolence you're suffering. Dunno, just dunno. Cinema Lumiere begins a run of Rebecca and Strangers on a Train.

Monday: Nuthin new nowhere. Tuesday: General stasis holds sway except at the Science Centre which presents yet another New German Film: Das Brot des Backers which concerns "a young man who works as an apprentice in a baker's shop, goes to work for a commercial bakery, but returns to the peace and simplicity of the home bakery." Colour me with yawns.

Wednesday: OISE urges you to start serving up your friends in a pie with Godard's Weekend and Nelson Periera Dos Santos' How Tasty Was My Little Frenchman. While the Germans at the Science Centre get lively with Expulsion from Paradise. The Ontario College of Art has another entry in its series of documentaries, a program of films from the '30's featuring the work of John Grierson.

Thursday: The Science Centre claims it has a provocative reevaluation of German history in Stunde Null. OISE continues to improve with null (although they're probably growing thin and meagre) and offers a curious program of Terrence Malik's Badlands and James Brenning's Eleven By Fourteen. Both of them are set in those midwest states you can never remember the names of. And that's about it. Best week in a while but that's not saying a bunch.

classical

Canadian baritone Gary Relyea and Toronto-based pianists Elyadim Tausig and Kathryn Root perform tonight at 8:30 in the St. Lawrence Centre. Beautiful program of rare Brahms and Schumann, including the two-piano Haydn Variations and some four-hands Gypsy Songs and Hungarian Dances. Student rush $2.50.

Giuseppe Macina's Toronto Opera Repertoire is staging six 8:30 Carmen performances over two weekends starting tonight. Central Tech Theatre.

Tomorrow at 8:30 Array presents a broad assortment of avant-garde works, including a few premiers. The Art Works, 50 Bleeker St.

Russian soprano Galina Vishnevskaya's visit to the Edward Johnson Building is one of the three or four most important musical events of the season. Her program is all-Russian: Tchaikovsky, Glinka, Rimsky-Korsakov, Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff. Get your head fixed if you turn it down. Sunday at 8:30, tickets $4 and $7.

Singing funny-type Anna Russell performs at 8:00 in Massey Hall. Satirical, irreverent, wry, sardonic, comic, lampooning send-ups of opera and song.

The TSO is still on sabbatical, so no orchestra this week. Wednesday night some exchange program performers from Western play in Walter Hall. Numbers include Mozart's K.370 Quartet and Ernest Bloch's Suite for Viola and Piano. Free at 8:30.

Thursday at 1:30 the Women's Musical Club presents the French String Trio with distinguished flutist Michel Debost. St. Andrew's Presbyterian, Students $2.

art

Mimi Matte's paintings at Hart House play with the image of the victim - a little something for all of us. But the show closes today and is worth seeing. For something less challenging, see Andrew Smith's Naked Clothing at the Isaacs Gallery or "how not to starch shirts". Till Feb. 3.

Hart House Art Market Seminars surge ahead on Wednesday with Jack Pollock discussing gallery ownership at 7 p.m. in the Bickerstick Room. If you're not interested in art as a commodity, you can ask him about his own paintings.

Van Goghites should take a trip to Harbourfront next week for a four performance - run of "Yellow House at Arles", a play by two Canadian artists. Premiering Feb. 1 at 8:30 at the Harbourfront Theatre. Harbourfront also has an exhibition of "systems painting" by Sam Perepelkin opening on Tuesday.

It may be a long way to go but Hamilton's Florence Abbott Gallery has an exhibition of Vaclav Vaca's surreal paintings. Do it as a gesture to your masked self. Till Feb. 15. On the other hand, Victoria College's New Academic building has the advantage of propinquity with its exhibition and sale of works and posters by Charles Pachter. Yes folks, for only $15 you can purchase a Pachter poster such as "Flight of the Toaster" and "Queen on Moose". Till Feb. 10.

An exhibition of 19th century Canadian watercolour paintings is running neck and neck with the ever popular British watercolour masters of the 19th century at the AGO. Will Constable, Turner and Blake for the Brits stump Way, Creswell, and Fowler for the Canadians? Till Feb. 19 and Feb. 12.

Now that the Christian Scientology building has burned down on Avenue Road, wayward souls may be seeking a viable alternative. I would suggest a visit to the Lawren Harris exhibition at the AGO. It's no secret that Harris was a mystic bordering on his mother's passion for Christian Science. It's also no secret that this is the best show in town. Till Feb. 26.

Also at the AGO are works by Video artists and glimpses at the seedier sides of nightlife by photographer Michael Mitchell. Till Feb. 26 and 19.

Yorkvilliers will find a number of good shows in the area. Nancy Poole's Studio features collages by Barry Argyle, Frank Stella is at the Sable-Castelli Gallery, till Feb. 11, multimedia by Joseph Hirsch at the Prince Arthur Galleries till tomorrow, etchings by Antonio Andividero till the end of the month, and Ray Cattell at Gallery Moos till Feb. 2.

If you liked what you saw at the Lawren Harris show at the AGO, there are some more affordable drawings by Harris at the Roberts Gallery.

The big news of the week is that the Scottish legend, Billy Connolly, will be at Massey Hall on the 14th of Feb. That might seem flippant to some, but anyone with an inkling of a Scottish heritage would kill to hear him sing "Danny Boy".

Aside from that, rhythm-box Santana will be at the Gardens on the 16th. They put on a mildly diverting concert, but it's nothing to write home about. Golden Earring will be opening for Ted "the man" Nugent on the 14th and the inevitable ELP will be doing two shows, one on the 2nd and the 3rd of the coming month, both at the Gardens. Triumph and Rose, two Trawna outfits, will be at Massey Hall on the 17th of Feb. And, for all you fans of cozy-listening-pasta-shlock, Albo Martino will be at Massey Hall on the 1st of Feb. Finally, Sam Larkin will be at the Eaton Centre doing a freebie on Feb. 6th.

On your proverbial pub circuit, Prairie Oyster is upstairs at the El Mocambo tonight, with The Little Girl and the Dreadful Snake downstairs. The Gasworks has Harbinger and the Chimney has Lunx. In the lighter vein, Michael Cooney is at the Groaning Board and Ray Materick is at the Riverboat tonight. If you don't have the bucks to paint the big cabbage pink, Harry Chaplin will be on, Ninety Minutes Live next Wednesday and Bruce Cockburn will be on the same show on Tuesday.

No sooner do we have a superfluity of writers, than we have a dire shortage of space. Any review is a good review if it is less than twelve copy inches. On campus, the season is hotting up: at Hart House, an admirable production of Volpone closes tomorrow night; call the box office and try and squeeze in either of the remaining shows (978-8668). And as soon as the boards are cleared, Vic is presenting Company, beginning Tuesday and running until Saturday. Call 978-3820 for more information. At the U.C. Playhouse, tonight at 8:30 and tomorrow at the same time, and again at 11:00, Sartre's No Exit. Free tickets, reserve at 978-6307. It is rumoured that there will be a production at the Studio on Glen Morris, later next week. Watch for posters. Also coming up soon are Stage Fright, at New, beginning the first. Tickets at the Porter's Lodge, $2.50.

And, the rest, all mixed: at the Factory Theatre Lab, 207 Adelaide, George Walker's Beyond Mozambique, 8:30 shows, Sunday matinee at 2:30; call 864-9971. The Mime Company Unlimited, operating out of the Unlimited Space, 95 Danforth, presents Intersection. Evenings at 8:30, Sunday PWYC at 3:30. Call 461-6551. At the Phoenix, 390 Dupont, Pinter's Old Times, call 922-7835 for details. At the Poor Alex, 296 Brunswick, John Herbert's The Wonderful Whores opens tonight. Call 225-6849. Tarragon continues with St. Carmen of the Main. Sorry we had so little space to review, it's important and worthwhile. Call 531-1827, shows at 8:30. Starting tomorrow, a 10:30 production of The Midnight Opera. The Spitta has just opened at Toronto Free, 368-2856 for reservations. Nothing to Lose continues at TFF until the 4th; and The Club maintains its position at TWP, minus Linda Thorson and some of its vitality; call 925-8640.

Congratulations to anyone who's made it this far. Making a watsup is almost as boring as reading it. Sorry for all the vagueness this week. Time and the Irish Rovers wait for no man.

By GLYNIS PETERS

What are you doing Friday night? No plans? Why not take in some excellent free entertainment at Varsity Arena, between 5 and 7 p.m.? The U of T Figure Skating team is hosting an exhibition competition that will include representatives from Queen's and MacMaster.

The Toronto team will be setting somewhat of a precedent by performing their two group numbers. As a rule the teams are reluctant to risk displaying their ideas in this area, for fear of plagiarism. Coach Jane Wilton feels, however, that the experience of competition will far outweigh any possible borrowing done by other teams.

The group number uses 12 people. This is the maximum number allowed to compete and makes the routine much more difficult, a fact taken into consideration by the judges. Toronto has matched their routine to the modern version of Beethoven's Fifth, which sounds interesting enough to lure this writer to the rink-side.

The other group number, called Formation Fourteen, uses four people. During the dance, the skaters must remain within arm's length of each other.

Free skating will also be included in the program and U. of T. will have two skaters in each category wherever possible.

Join the crowds at Varsity Arena Friday night, from 5 to 7 to watch some good skating. If you don't know what an "axe" or a "double loop" is, "break the ice" and ask that skating fan beside you!

Blues Tie Gryphons

By MARIAN KALIN

On Tuesday evening, the U of T Lady Blues Hockey team travelled through the snow to take on the Guelph Gryphons. Unfortunately the Gryphons were at a definite advantage on their home ice, which is much smaller and narrower than the majority of University rinks. They capitalized on this situation by out-shooting the Blues 29-11. Thanks to outstanding goal tending by Toronto's Mary Garland, only three of these shots went in. Toronto outplayed, outskated and totally dominated the play, but Guelph took advantage of three scrambles to score. At the beginning of the game both teams were testing each other, resulting in a scoreless first period.

The Gryphons started the scoring at 6:04 in the second. Not to be outdone, Val Bush, assisted by Lynda Harley tied up the score by popping one in shortly afterwards. Both teams fought hard, but the score remained tied 1-1 at the end of the second.

Early in the third Val Bush scored again, assisted by Harley and Maureen Mitchell. Guelph came back quickly to tie once again. Bush completed her hat trick on a break away however, putting Toronto in the lead. Toronto worked hard to maintain this lead but during a goal-mouth scramble Guelph scored, with 1:25 remaining, leaving the final score at 3-3.

Several players deserve mention for their effort during the game. First year player, Glenna Atkinson, who has been steadily improving all year, played her best game of the season on defense. Rosie Harrison, Pau Cervenka and Adrian Stanowski also played strong defensive games.

This tie against Guelph puts the Blues in third place behind Mac and Guelph. Coach Dave McMaster is optimistic that with a win this Thursday over York, the Lady Blues will earn a play-off spot.

In This Corner: Tony Canzano

By DAVID HEALEY

He starts things rolling at five pm in Varsity Stadium. His name is Tony Canzano and he is the head coach of the U of T boxing club.

"Grab a rope fellas, and start skipping." After the warm-up, Canzano gets down to business. He starts rehearsing his boys on their punches, speed, and footwork. He has them moving to the left and then right, jabbing the air with both hands. Then it's backwards and forwards.

"You've got to keep them thinking," says Canzano, as he calls out different combinations such as "weave and hook", "both hands to the head", and "combination upper cut". "If they don't learn to think fast, they'll never be good boxers," he says. "They've got to get familiar with the different movements and be able to adapt themselves quickly to them. At the same time they've got to be accurate and swift. Boxing is knowing how to do a whole lot of things well, at the same time."

Canzano is on hand to see that they do it well. He constantly watches for mistakes and he finds plenty. He goes over the problem with each member until they can do it right. He seems to be forever calling out "move up and down" and "bend your knees. Don't drop your hands".

"If I don't keep reminding them of their mistakes," says Canzano, "they'll never learn. The only solution is to keep at them until they get it."

"They've got to learn to roll their head and shoulders with their punches," he says. "That way it's harder for the other guy to hit them. To stand still is like asking the other guy to clobber you. One of the most important things in boxing is to keep moving. I've been in this business a long time and I've seen the difference it can make."

Bill Fisher, the former U of T inter-collegiate welterweight champ of 1968, adds credence to Canzano's claim. "Tony was my coach for four years and he knows boxing in and out," says Fisher. "He was the Canadian flyweight champion in the 30s and he's been teaching boxing ever since. There's not many around here who can lay claim to a record like that."

"Tony teaches you to box in a very practical way," says Fisher. "He gives you something that you'll never learn in a classroom. It's sort of a learning experience in a different dimension."

Fisher, following in Canzano's footsteps, teaches boxing to the high school students of Michael Power. "What I'd like to do with the kids I'm working with, is what Tony did with me," says Fisher. "I want to teach them something about life in a practical and no-nonsense way. I want to give them the benefit of the learning experience that Tony gave me."

Canzano has many other admirers and the biggest, are the boys he works with now. Richard Wright, a veteran boxer of three years calls Tony "a great coach". "He knows what he's talking about and a lot of guys keep coming out regularly not just for the boxing but also because of an affection for Tony. He kind of grows on you."

Dr. Neil Miles, who has returned to U of T for further study, says "Tony is a great little guy. He knows how to box and get you into good shape without wearing you to the bone. And best of all, he keeps the sport gentlemanly."

"We teach you to box, not fight," says Canzano. "Anybody can fight. Here you learn to protect yourself the right way. I don't specialize in training monsters."

"We generally start out with a couple of weeks of training and shadow-boxing so that the beginners can get an idea of the basic movements," says Canzano. "After that we start sparring and that's where you learn your mistakes. The best teacher is in there," as he points to the ring.

"But nobody forces you," he says. "If you don't want to box, it's O.K. with me. Anybody is welcome to come out just for the workout if that's what they want."

Canzano is especially busy training his boys for the Brockport State meet, coming up in a month, and the Pennsylvania Westcheshire Finals in March. "We generally divide the boys up in their respective weight classes and then pick the best from the sparring matches," says

Canzano. "But that's a while yet. What I'm interested in right now is to get these guys in shape and make them reasonably adequate boxers."

"Canzano's the main man," says one veteran boxer. As you watch him correcting and advising his boys, you get the opinion that the statement is pretty close to the truth.

It is not surprising to see the Hockey 'Blues' at the top of the National Rankings when you look at the team's scoring statistics.

Counting exhibition action, the Blues have netted 202 goals after only 27 games, for a remarkable 7.5 average. 107 of these goals have come in their 12-league games.

Much of the Blues' strength lies with the productivity of their defence. Rob Gemmel leads the defencemen with 13 goals and 25 assists, while his partner Rocci Pagnello has accumulated 27 points with six goals and 21 assists.

The rookie defence pairing of Brad Tambllyn and Joe Grant have also proven their worth on the scoresheet with 48 points between them.

As has been the case all season, Doug Caines continues to lead all scorers. This remarkable centre is coming off a 10-point weekend which pushed his point total to 56, 30 of these have been goals.

Game Of The Week

By JIM McLEAN

As the year progresses the difference in the intercollegiate standings remains slight. The fight for playoff spots will probably go on until the last game of the year. The teams are finding that even one loss could result in a lower standing or even elimination.

The game between St. Michaels B and Jr. Engineering on Tuesday night at Varsity was indicative of this situation. St. Mike's, however, proved themselves dominant winning the game 6-1. This victory places them ahead of the Engineers who are in the midst of a slump.

The first period belonged to St. Mike's although the score didn't reflect this. The Engineers appeared to dominate the early part of the game until Terry Dineen of St. Mike's scored on a goal mouth scramble.

Engineers did not let down and continued their impressive offensive. But a basic defensive error resulted in a second goal slapped in by St. Mike's Larry Lanefield.

The third St. Mike's goal was a result of sheer persistence by Pat Grans who outthrust the entire Engineering team in their own end to earn an unassisted goal.

St. Mike's dominance continued into the second period when Grans banded in his second goal of the evening to give his team an 4-0 margin.

The period continued uneventfully until the halfway mark when St. Mike's Ed Gal, slapped one in from the point after centreman Bill RTeid cleanly won the faceoff.

After St. Mike's drew a penalty for interference, Engineers managed another impressive power play but were again shutout.

To make matters worse for Engineers, Gal of St. Mike's shot in his second goal to give his team an even wider 6-0 lead.

It wasn't until the closing minutes when Langlois' shutout seemed certain that Engineers J. Gulbinas scored on an unexpected shot from a tough angle.

Although both teams are neck and neck in the standings, St. Mike's displayed how much more they wanted the game: by their determination and hustle. All St. Mike's players appeared keyed up and hungry for puck. The result of which was a near perfect game and a one point advantage over Engineers in the standings.

Admiring the unfinished art in Spadina subway.
The Varsity — Sean Dunphy

'Neat and weird'

By SEAN DUNPHY

Thousands of Torontonians turned out Saturday morning for the first day of public service on the spanking new Spadina subway line. Taking advantage of the free rides offered on the new line for its first day, the public arrived in force complete with families and cameras to view the much wanted artwork and architecture of the $200-million, 10-kilometre addition to Metro's subway network.

People seemed to be pleased with the esthetics of the new stations, but as one patron put it: "It's like the Eaton Centre. It's so neat, so new, so queer and so confusing." Each station is different, and some, like the St. Clair West Station, are massive.

The atmosphere was like that of a carnival, with people oo'ing and aaah'ing at the murals; TTC people handing out buttons and brochures commemorating the event; auxiliary police in their checkered hats patrolling the stations; frequent announcements over the public address system informing people where the artist of a particular mural could be found for questions; and passengers cramming into the first car of each train for a better view, etc.

There were a few snags however. The long moving sidewalk connecting the two Spadina stations was only moving in one direction, and portions of the Spadina and Dupont stations were incomplete. People also complained that most of the stations are open air, and consequently very cold, and that many of the trains still carried the old route maps. However, the public washrooms at the Wilson station seemed to be a big hit judging by the long lines.

During the ride from Wilson to Eglinton West, the presence of the Spadina Expressway on either side of the train, and its abrupt termination at Eglinton, are reminders that the subway was built up Spadina Avenue instead of Bathurst Street in order to keep hopes for the Spadina Expressway alive.

The subway is not likely to make much difference in travelling time to U of T students, as no plans have yet been made for a Robarts Library or Sid Smith station. However, travelling time for those living in the north-west corridor of the city, as well as rush hour congestion, should be reduced once people have adjusted to the new bus schedules and routes. A small piece of advice: don't transfer to the Bloor line from Spadina — the moving sidewalks are very long, and bound to be heavily congested at rush hour.

The TTC expects the new line to generate 12 million new riders this year. Students can expect to pay as much as the general public for the latest addition to the TTC's deficit according to Students' Administrative Council (SAC) representative Bob Charney. He has been negotiating on behalf of SAC with the TTC for lower student fares without success.

Showdown at Innis

By GEORGE COOK

A difference of opinion between Innis College principal William Saywell and the Innis College Council over the Independent Studies program led to a reaffirmation of strength for Saywell in a showdown meeting last Friday.

In a lengthy debate Council decided that the principal had a right to differ publicly from the council "in matters which are not central to college policy, as determined by council." The council did not, however, define which matters are in fact central to college policy.

Independent Studies, as it is now constituted, consists of five part-time resource people with general knowledge in Philosophy, Community Research, Psychotherapy, Jewish Studies and Yoga.

In a letter to the council dated January 8, 1976 Saywell stated that "by definition Independent Studies should not have a continuing resource staff supervising a wide range of topics however well qualified all, or any one of them may be in his or her own areas of expertise."

On January 17 the council passed several motions reaffirming its support for the Independent Studies program "in approximately its present form." The council also said it believed "the use of resource people rather than of authorities in specific fields as supervisors is one valuable approach to independent study."

In his letter Saywell stated that "the issue involved is so fundamental to this college and its future that my opposition to the position council has taken might best be questioned in some form of vote of confidence in my leadership."

Asked if he would differ publicly from Council on a matter that, in Council's opinion, was fundamental to college policy Saywell said, "In the case of a fundamental issue like academic excellence I would openly disagree with council."

"Legally I can speak my mind whenever I wish," Saywell said. "But I try to abide by the open democratic way of proceeding we have at Innis."

Dave Reinboth, President of the Innis College Student Society (ICSS) said he felt "that internally a principal could disagree with fundamental college policy but when going to external university bodies he should put forth the views of council."

The 44-member council is an advisory body with no constitutional or legal authority over the principal. Half its members are students.

The Independent Studies program is currently under review by a committee on college courses in the Faculty of Arts and Science. Its chairman is faculty dean Arthur Kruger.

"Things are getting tougher. There's a more hard-nosed attitude generally," Saywell said. He added that financial constraints at the university are in part responsible for the committee's is taking a closer look at the program this year but that the changes he has proposed for Independent Studies "are not specifically designed to save money."

Kruger would not comment on his position regarding Independent Studies at Innis but stated that the committee would hear from all people involved. "We have already heard from people teaching the courses, and we're prepared to hear anyone who wants to come," he said.

The next meeting of the committee on college courses is today at 4 p.m.

Five Innis instructors could lose positions

By GEORGE COOK

The Varsity has learned that all five part-time resource people involved in Innis College's Independent Studies program were sent registered letters last December informing them that due to budgetary restraints their employment may be terminated at the end of the 1977-78 academic year.

Wendy Donner, one of the five, said the letter came from William Saywell, the principal of the college.

Saywell confirmed this last night. "Council decided that if we didn't get full funding this year two positions would be terminated. Not knowing which two, as in the previous year, I wrote letters to all the instructors concerned."

The college council has not yet approved the budget, according to Donner. Nor has the future of the Independent Studies program been decided by the committee on college course of the Faculty of Arts and Science. But Saywell stated that all five knew of the impending cuts and that he was only following normal procedure.

Jean Smith, President of the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) refused comment on the matter because there is "a potential grievance involved. We're concerned that procedural due process be followed," he said.

$105 lunch brings Vic wrath

By KEN WHITEHURST

The Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) unleashed a blistering penalty shot at the Victoria College Athletic Union's (VCAU) executive by approving a motion, 12-3, calling on Victoria's Board of Regents, the federated college's governing council, to withdraw its recognition of the men's athletic union.

The motion came amid charges by some VUSAC representatives that the athletic union executive spent $105 to buy lunch for themselves.

The motion's mover, Bill Siksay, who was last year's VUSAC President and was voting by authority of an absent representative's proxy, charged that the VCAU executive ignored their constitution, mismanaged their finances, and failed to include VCAU members in the planning of the athletic program.

All men registered at Victoria College are members of the VCAU, which, as an organization autonomous of VUSAC, receives its money from an athletic fee collected from all men at the college.

VCAU President Bob Isles was not present for the first part of the council's questioning of his executive. He arrived only after VUSAC President Alistair Macrae coaxed him out of the Vic Pub.

Isles, red-faced and belligerent, refused to answer questions from VUSAC representatives about the alleged $105 lunch, but outside the meeting Isles denied his executive had spent VCAU money on lunch for themselves.

He explained that he did not answer the council's queries because he feels his organization is responsible to its membership and not to the students' council. A petition signed by 20 VCAU members would require the athletic union executive to call a general meeting.

"The only reason I came to the VUSAC meeting at all is because Alistair Macrae is a reasonable man. I don't have much respect for some people on council, but Macrae is a good man," said Isles.

Responding to charges that their finances are mishandled, VCAU Treasurer Peter Doukas said: "We've kept books that any athletic union member can check if they want." He pointed out that the present executive was saddled with $2,200 in debts from past years, and with no more money than their predecessors, this year's executive would manage to pay off the debts and stay within their $6,600 budget.

VCAU vice-president Craig Wardlaw wanted to know what specific criticisms VUSAC had of the athletic program. He said he has not heard many complaints and does not understand what VUSAC is upset about.

Doukas thinks that attacking the VCAU is a pet project of Bill Siksay. "He's wanted to control us since last year," he commented. Siksay says he is acting in what he perceives to be the students' interests.

VUSAC Finance Commissioner Tom Sinclair, who voted against the motion, called the council's action "drastic." He is worried that if the matter reaches the Board of Regents withdrawal of recognition would be "railroaded through" because the board is not well acquainted with the conflict between the student council and the athletic union.

According to the VUSAC constitution, a motion asking the Board of Regents to withdraw recognition of the VCAU must pass twice with a two-week interval between votes. The vote on Thursday was the first of the two required.

VUSAC Communications Commissioner Bill MacNeil expressed remorse about the way the VCAU executive was treated. "I felt sorry, what with these guys being dragged in from the pub to be questioned," he said. MacNeil, in spite of supporting the motion, is unsure the council acted properly. He hopes to see the matter cleared up before the council votes again.

Candidate snowed out of race

By PHILIP LIBMAN

Thursday's blizzard claimed its first political victim at the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) when SAC Vice-President Dave Jones' nomination papers for Governing Council representative were not accepted. Jones was stranded out of town. He was nominated in the full-time undergraduate Arts and Science constituency.

Governing Council Chief Returning Officer Ross Smith rejected them because they contained no proof of Jones' Canadian citizenship required under election regulations.

The nomination, which was filed for Jones 15 minutes before the Friday noon deadline by SAC University Government Commissioner Brian O'Riordan, with proof of citizenship, was rejected by Smith because "it is illegal to knowingly file an incorrect nomination."

Jones was in Vancouver last week attending an Association of Student Councils (AOSC) conference in his role as Ontario representative to its board of directors. He was scheduled to return to Toronto on Thursday afternoon but the storm delayed his flight and he was stuck in Vancouver with the proof of his citizenship at his home in Alliston, Ontario. Jones returned to Toronto Friday at 4 p.m.

O'Riordan was upset by Smith's action and said: "The only valid candidate has been invalidated because of the oppressive policies of Simcoe Hall."

O'Riordan explained that "by the time we knew for sure that Jones wouldn't make it back by the Friday noon deadline it was too late to get the papers from his home."

Later that day, O'Riordan learned that the roads to Alliston had been cleared and drove to Jones' home to get the necessary papers. He delivered them to Smith at 4:55 p.m. but Smith held to his earlier decision.

When asked what he was going to do now, O'Riordan stated, "We will be appealing it to the Election Advisory Committee which is responsible for these elections on two grounds. One is the weather and the fact that Jones just couldn't make it back in time and the second reason is that in order for Jones to register this year he had to declare his citizenship. The Governing Council has on file that he is a Canadian citizen because they charged him the lower fees."

"Therefore this is all a technicality and just added paperwork. I am confident that we will win the appeal."

When asked if the deadline for nominations would be extended because of the weather, Smith said, "This is a decision for the Election Advisory Committee, and I haven't been able to get hold of the chairman, Governing Council student rep Peter Neilson. I don't have the power to extend the deadline."

At press time last night Neilson was unavailable for comment. The committee is expected to make a decision in a week.

Book fund in a bind, but help is on the way

By JOHN D'ANGELO

Responding to the need for quick and urgent analysis of the U of T Library budget composition to devise solutions for the financially deprived Book Acquisitions Fund, the chairman of the Advisory Committee on the University of Toronto Library System last Thursday assigned a subcommittee to report on budgetary alternatives.

Richard Helmstadter said the subcommittee's proposals, expected by the end of March, will be passed on to Simcoe Hall which has indicated intentions of initiating a university-wide discussion.

The subcommittee will co-opt David Esplin, Librarian in charge of Acquisitions, to aid in their research, and efforts will be made to have discussions with university departmental representatives about giving book acquisitions priority, especially in periodicals where the steepest price increases are being experienced.

Ryan stressed that fundamental questions must be asked of the importance of the library budget within the total university budget.

"We've seen implied priorities within the book acquisition fund, but we haven't analyzed implied priorities within the university budget as a whole," he said, and he wondered "if it is possible to have the administration articulate some sort of concrete commitment on the extent and quality of the library service."

Father B. Black, Chief Librarian at St. Mike's, added that "the community needs to know on what basis the budget was arrived at" — it seems that Simcoe Hall doesn't divulge that sort of information.

In his investigations of recent library purchases Esplin was bemused to find a book on crystallography written in Russian, the main parts of which have already been translated into English. Professor S.C. Nyburg of the Chemistry department, a crystallographer himself, remarked that he would be fascinated to learn of a single person in Canada who would be required to read the text.

Esplin's reply was that "if there is a book there by some Russian on crystallography, then somebody from the department must have ordered it."

Making it with art for fun

By GILLIAN O'REILLY

"I'm a natural collector, I collect anything, even subway transfers," said Henry Jackman on Wednesday at a Hart House lecture on the role of the art collector.

Mr. and Mrs. Jackman, who have been collecting art for 50 years, spoke to an audience of approximately 30 people about their varying approaches to collecting.

Jackman, who said he collects for pleasure, disagrees with the philosophy of Morton Shulman's book "How To Make a Million Collecting Art". However, he remarked that "under our capitalist system you can't grow rich unless you own something. Art is good because you can get pleasure from it while it appreciates."

One of the best features of collecting, he said, is the "fun of discovering bargains." If you want to sell a piece of art, he advised, do it where there is a market, such as New York or London.

Through collecting, Mrs. Jackman became interested in art history, to the point of considering professional criticism. She enrolled in art courses at U of T and consequently approaches its collection with a much more scholarly view than does her husband.

"The sad thing about collecting," Mr. Jackman commented, "is that if one is too successful, one's collection gets too valuable and you have to give it to a public institution."

One of the gifts they gave to the National Gallery in Ottawa was a collection of over 20 murals painted by the Group of Seven during the First World War. These murals were hanging in the Georgian Bay cottage which the Jackmans bought in the 1940's from Dr. James McCallum, a friend of the Group. The threat of weather damage forced them to find a safer place for the works.

Jackman is responsible for the statue of Winston Churchill by British artist Lehmann which has been given to the City of Toronto. His next project is the erection of a memorial to the fliers of the First and Second World Wars. He admits that his purpose in these monuments is not so much the art as the aspect of leadership which they illustrate.

Space research well-funded here

By BRENDA MILLER

Despite the continuing decline in graduate student enrolment and research income, the University of Toronto Institute for Aerospace Studies (IAS) is presently growing and research support is at the highest level for some time, according to Professor J.H. de Leeuw, Director of IAS.

The 29-year old institute, located in Downsview, houses the research facilities for graduate students studying aerospace engineering. "We do research and graduate studies — we're not a teaching department," said Leeuw. The IAS is the only Canadian institute where graduate students can take up aerospace studies.

Emphasis in research is on airplane and space flight. More than 60 graduate students explore projects of specific interest to their instructor and their particular financiers.

Investigation covers such projects as perfecting air-cushioned vehicles used, for example, by government agencies for transportation over northern Canadian muskies; the effects of sonic booms on people and structures; the use of laser beams to detect pollutants or to investigate oil spills; and the study of fusion technology as a possible solution to an alleged looming energy shortage.

The nature of the project determines its funding at IAS, Leeuw said. Various Canadian government agencies, such as the Defence Research Board, the Ministry of Transportation, the National Research Council, and the Department of Agriculture finance IAS research of interest to them in areas of national defence, communications and environmental studies.

Support is also received from American government agencies such as the Air Force Office of Scientific Research-U.S. Air Force and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), and from corporations such as Imperial Oil and private aircraft companies.

In a current, much-publicized project, IAS will place structural shapes made of advanced composite material in the cargo hold of the NASA space shuttle Enterprise. When the Enterprise is launched in 1980, the module containing the shapes will be put into orbit for six to nine months to determine the effects of outer space environment on spacecraft material. It is one of 25 experiments chosen by NASA from 190 international proposals.

To enter IAS, students generally study engineering and specialize under the Department of Engineering Science of the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering at U of T during their third and fourth years. Their post-graduate year is spent at IAS working towards M.A.Sc. or M.Eng. degrees.

In the Jan. 25 issue of the Varsity an article entitled "GAA, admin at loggerheads," contained statements by GAA business agent Jean Greatbatch that the conciliation process was a drain on the GAA's budget. A conciliator is in fact paid for by the province's taxpayers and therefore would cost the GAA nothing.

ELECTION

ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

• FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

Students: Seats available - 2 in each of Victoria, Trinity, New, Erindale Colleges
Seats available - 1 in each of University, Woodsworth Colleges

Faculty:

Departmental

Humanities Seats available - 1 in each of EAS, ENG, SRE, GER, HIS, ITA, LIN, NES, REL, SIS
Life Sciences Seats available - 1 in BOT
Physical Sciences Seats available - 1 in each of AST, CHM, GLG
Social Sciences Seats available - 1 in ANT
Erindale Seats available - 3

Divisional

Humanities Seats available - 1
Life Sciences Seats available - 3
Physical Sciences Seats available - 2
Social Sciences Seats available - 4

• STUDENTS

- COMMITTEE ON STUDY ELSEWHERE
- COUNSELLING COMMITTEE

Curriculum Committees

Students:

College Courses and Programmes Seats available - 2 (including 1 part-time student)
Humanities Seats available - 3 (full-time students)
Life Sciences Seats available - 2 (including 1 part-time)
Physical Sciences Seats available - 4 (including 1 part-time)
Social Sciences Seats available - 1 (full-time student)

Faculty:

College Courses and Programmes Seats available - 5
Humanities Seats available - 4
Life Sciences Seats available - 3
Physical Sciences Seats available - 4
Social Sciences Seats available - 3

Committee On Counselling

Students Seats available - 1 in each of University, Trinity, New, Erindale and Woodsworth Colleges

Committee On Study Elsewhere

Students Seats available - 1

NOMINATIONS

Nomination forms can also be obtained through Departmental, Registrars, APUS and ASSU offices or from the Faculty Office. Completed nomination forms must be received in the Faculty Office, Room 1006, Sidney Smith Hall, prior to 4:00 p.m. on February 10th, 1978 to be valid.

Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 978-3389 or 978-3392. A complete description of the Committees of the Faculty Council is to be found in the 1977-78 calendar of the Faculty pages 10-11 and 336-338.

He made his way to the parapet and stood there firing. This was revenge on a big scale. Each one of his shots averaged some ambient scruple. One for Lola whom I dared not rob; one for Marcelle whom I ought to have left in the lurch; one for Odette whom I didn't want to kiss. This for the books I never dared to write, this for the journeys I never made, this for everybody in general whom I wanted to hate but tried to understand. He fired, and the tables of the Law crashed about him — Thou Shalt Love Thy Neighbor as Thyself — bang! in that bugger's face — Thou Shalt Not Kill — bang! at that scarecrow opposite. He was firing on his fellow men, on Virtue, on the whole world: Liberty! Terror. The Marine was abhor, his head was ablaze. Bullets were whirling round him as the air. The words is going up in smoke and me with it... Nothing more to ask of Fate now except one half-minute. Just time enough to fire at that smart officer, at all the Beauty of the Earth, at the street, at the flowers, at the gardens, at everything he had loved. Beauty dived down towards like some oblique bird. But Mathieu went on firing. He fired, he was cleared. He was at-powerful. He was free.

Women vs Cutbacks

The most glaring hypocrisy of all in the government's publicity on the new student aid programme is that changes in the plan, such as no longer requiring loans before grants, will further some kind of "equality for lower income students." Harry Parrott, the Minister of Colleges and Universities has made it quite clear that the further restricting of grant availability, through a redefinition of the independence category and by placing a severe time-limit on the qualifying period, will in effect increase pressure to go into debt. On campus the other week, Parrott let us know that he has already prepared the banks for an increase in requests for loans by students.

While this certainly affects all students and would-be students, it especially hits those of us with less earning power to pay back any debt. And this means women. The programme is an attack on any gains we've made in education.

The cut in grant availability and the prospect of huge debt repayments will force many women to give up post-secondary education as a possibility and keep us dependent on parents and spouses at a time when we are struggling to attain financial security in our own right.

Many of us have looked to education as a vehicle for expanding our alternatives and getting an edge on the widening gap between men's and women's wages — "Why not," remember? Even now we face lower summer earnings, higher unemployment and the prospect of earning 47% of the wages of men after graduation. We can't afford the OSAP cutbacks too.

The SAC Women's Commission has started a petition campaign against the cuts. Flyerson is currently running a similar campaign. Take a minute to sign up at the nearest SAC desk. Help distribute copies too. Contact us at 978-4911 for more information.

The petition demands read:

1. That there be no time limit in eligibility for grants. This provision cuts off graduate students, part-time students and those who change their study programmes to meet the rapid changes in the labour market.
2. An end to the dependent category. As adults we have assumed the responsibility for the work involved in our programmes and demand assistance in our own right, independently of our parents' expenses.

3. Grants to be substantially increased to reflect the cost of living and high unemployment rate.
4. A full grant covering all costs for all students, which is a wage in recognition of the work involved in our training.

OFS a failure

The January 12 meeting with Harry Parrott to discuss the new OSAP regulations was a significant event for students at University of Toronto and throughout Ontario. This is not because Parrott gave any satisfactory answers to the questions posed but because a long overdue discussion has been initiated by Mario Cutajar's January 13 editorial and the subsequent replies in the January 20 Varsity from the OSU Executive Committee and SAC's Brian O'Riordan.

Unfortunately, this debate has been diverted from the real question at hand. Any lack of democracy, elements of sectarianism or monopolization by OFS were not the most glaring aspects of the meeting. What continues to be most evident is the failure of OFS to offer an effective strategy for opposing the new OSAP restrictions. This is what needs to be discussed.

Universal accessibility has never been the Ontario government's objective. Their concern has been how best to defend the profits of big business and today this means cutbacks in education spending, racist differential fees, tuition hikes and restrictions on student aid. These attacks on students will continue unless we unite to actively fight for our interests.

The OSU Executive has defended itself and OFS for "fighting for crumbs, such as whether the sons and daughters of working people are given access to Ontario universities, whether international students are forced to pay differential fees, and whether students are able to find summer and post-graduate employment." The point is, as Cutajar stated, "our achievements to date are abysmal."

The OFS, presumably with the OSU Executive's full support, has launched another in a series of letter-writing and lobbying campaigns. This is the same approach which failed to halt differential fees and failed to halt last year's tuition hikes. According to OFS, the "mass lobby" held last November 10 at Queen's Park was designed to "express our concerns" and "raise the consciousness of MPPs." But only half of the MPPs even chose to meet with students. OFS cited Remembrance Day activities as a reason for the poor response. What a feeble excuse.

A group of students who appeared more like a friendly tour than concerned protestors are not going to influence the government to change its policies. The OFS leadership now plans a repeat performance at Queen's Park February 9. Surely they do not anticipate a more fruitful meeting.

OFS represents thousands of students across the province. Its role should be to provide leadership to students in the fight for quality education available to everyone, regardless of their financial situation. OFS has failed to meet this responsibility.

The strategy of its leadership reflects a lack of faith in students, a belief that students are incapable of understanding what is happening to post-secondary education and that they are unwilling to defend their own interests. The OFS leadership substitutes itself for the mass of students rather than relying on the power of students — our numbers — to turn back the continuing attacks on the right to an education.

Furthermore, students have little faith in OFS. They see OFS as a do-nothing research organization which is incapable of providing leadership.

To be effective, OFS should call a centralized protest action to launch a campaign in opposition to the government's new aid plan. An action, which could unite thousands of students against the government, must aim to win other sectors of society who are adversely affected by social service cutbacks to our side. This is the strategy that can win our demands because it is based on our power — thousands of students organized in mass action. The size and militancy of the six meetings with Parrott in the last four months strongly suggests that large numbers of students are willing to take some form of concrete action.

When the OSAP changes were announced in September the OSU president promised Parrott "to oppose you and the educational policies of your government as best we are able."

Now it appears that your primary concern is no longer opposing Parrott's attacks on students but trying to deal with criticisms of the OFS and its dead-end strategy. Your red-baiting of Mario Cutajar is an evasion of the worst kind. By doing so you serve the interests of the Ontario government and not those of students in this province. We are forced to ask the OSU Executive: What is your primary concern? Are you committed to defending students' interests?

You may disagree with our perspective of mass action. If so, what alternative do you have?

PECU and ECO 100

In your article of Fri. Jan. 20, regarding restriction of ECO 100 to entering day students who have a grade of at least 80% in Grade 13, you quote me as saying that the Political Economy Course Union (PECU) instead "prefers a policy of larger classes of enrolment on a first-come, first-served basis." This statement however is taken out of context in that it implies that PECU actually agrees with the Department of Political Economy that enrolment must be restricted. What was said in fact, is that this 80% requirement is highly objectionable, and that even such schemes as those mentioned above made more sense. Rather than discussing the various alternatives that should be implemented to restrict enrolment, the question should be, why have any restrictions at all? No one would deny that there is an increasing popularity in the discipline evidenced by an approximate 25% in ECO 100 this year, however the problem centers on the wider issue of cutbacks, specifically the lack of funds the Department of Political Economy has at its disposal. Through some form of twisted logic, funding of individual departments bears absolutely no relationship to increases or decreases in student enrolment. Hence Political Economy is to be included in an across-the-board 3% cut this year.

Regarding this 80% cutoff proposal specifically, it is well above the normal admission requirement on the St. George campus which is presently hovering around the 73% to 74% mark. This proposal also appears to contradict present U of T policy of opening up the university to more people who have been traditionally excluded often because they do not complete the standard 5 year secondary school program. A strong case can be made against putting even greater emphasis on high school performance, as secondary schools exhibit a distinct class and cultural bias, in that some are designed primarily as feeders into higher education, while others are not. We must not look at only the sheer number of students, but we also must be concerned who will be most affected by these proposed changes, and somehow one doubts that this would include those who attended such schools as UCC or UTS.

Petition experience

Thank you for your informative article "Student appeals have a chance, with help" (Oct. 31, 1977) which I find now, most helpful to me.

Last summer, I took a half credit Psychology course for which I received a mark of 48. On reading the Faculty of Arts and Science Calendar I found out that I would have a period of six months to petition the mark. However, when I tried to petition early this month (which is still within the specified six-month period) I was informed by the Prof. that all the examination papers had been destroyed and that there was nothing she could do. My College Registrar (Woodsworth) has proved to be as helpless as I am. I wonder, if this has anything to do with the fact that the Prof. in question is the Assistant Principal of Woodsworth College and that there may be any misuse of power involved.

Trying to see the Chairman (Acting) of the Psychology Dept. has proved to be another nightmarish experience. After consultation with the Chairman's secretary, after consultation with the Acting Chairman, referred me to the Undergraduate Secretary whose secretary again referred me to still another person (counselor, I believe) who told me that there was nothing to be done and maybe I deserved the mark anyway.

I find this whole thing both ridiculous and frustrating.

To conclude, I'd like to quote sections of the Faculty of Arts and Science Calendar (p. 34) "The regulations of the Faculty... should be observed carefully by each student. Failure to observe these regulations can result in academic and/or financial penalties." Look what happens when one observes these "regulations".

Freedom of the press

Around the walls of the Great Hall of Hart House are written the words of Milton's "Areopagitica", the greatest defense of the liberty of the press in the language. They serve to remind us that central to the life of the university is the defense of that freedom. Without the liberty to debate and publish freely, the pursuit of truth becomes a mockery and the business of the university sinks back into a medieval prescription of received ideas.

The lessons of this century alone serve to remind us that the university cannot sit idly by when the state acts to stifle press freedom, whether inside or outside the university. The raid on "The Body Politic" in December was just such an attempt to stifle discussion, both on the specific issue of paedophilia and on the larger one of civil liberties.

What is freedom of the press? It is the right to publish dissent, to discuss the unmentionable in tabloids. For the free man or woman no topic is taboo. The free publisher welcomes every controversy, the sound of human debate, for as William Blake warned, the disagreeable thought which is repressed will surely give birth to more disagreeable action.

It has been argued that "The Body Politic" article on paedophilia was out of season, but there is (as the editors themselves acknowledged) no time when the undiscussable is timely. There is no time when the Claire Hoys and Norman Websters will regard the issue as one that is tractable to reasonable discussion or debate. The subject is as closed as heliocentricity was to the Inquisition.

In that quotation in Hart House, Milton makes the point that the liberty of the state is best demonstrated by debate at what seems the worst possible time. Even when a city shall be as it were besieged and blocked about... and battle off rumored to be marching up even to her walls and suburb trenches; that then the people, or the greater part, more than any other times... should be disputing, reasoning, reading, inventing, discarding... things not before discussed or written of.

For whom does freedom of the press really matter? Not for the big dailies who speak

Wertmuller: Sweet filmmaking

By CONNIE FILLETTI

A capacity audience gathered at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute last Friday night to hear Italian film director Lina Wertmuller discuss her art, love, and politics.

Wertmuller, writer-director of such films as Love and Anarchy and Seven Beauties was in Toronto to promote her latest endeavour The End of the World in Our Usual Bed in a Night Full of Rain.

The film stars Giancarlo Giannini, leading man in most of Wertmuller's films. Accompanying Wertmuller on the promotional tour, Giannini also attended the Ryerson forum.

A Night Full of Rain was produced by Liberty Film (Wertmuller's and Giannini's production company) for Warner Brothers as part of a four-picture contract.

Asked why she was working with Warner Brothers, Wertmuller replied tongue-in-cheek that "there are stranger things in heaven and on earth than are known." She also cited the great expense involved in film-making today.

"It's a little cynical but even Michelangelo needed money for the Sistine Chapel."

How does Giannini work with Wertmuller?

"We work in a particular way. She writes the scripts, I'm the actor," he said. "We discuss a lot. We always talk until two or three in the morning. We love this work. When we begin to shoot it is easy for us to understand each other through the camera. This gives me a sense of freedom."

Talking about his roles in Wertmuller's films, Giannini expressed a dislike for playing characters which are close to his own life. He prefers to be in a world of fantasy. He said it is fun to invent.

Giannini admits that he plays a character closer to himself in A Night Full of Rain. His role, that of an Italian journalist in the film with a Communist and male chauvinistic outlook, was harder for him to perform for that reason.

Why did he take on such a role?

"I'm very shy. Believe it or not, it's true. I wanted to become an actor because it was a cure for me. You can become everything in film. If you are shy and overcome that, then you are forced to do something for an audience."

Wertmuller commented that all her films are variations on a theme and that she doesn't like improvisation. She likens her films to children and says "I don't want to change them."

Saying she has been a socialist for the past 25 years, Wertmuller expressed an "absolute" belief in freedom and democracy.

Using her film Sweet Away as a cinematic example of her socialist philosophy, she said the battle of the sexes represented in the film was a parable for the love of the bourgeois towards the Third World. Sweet Away is one of her more pessimistic films because that love finishes badly, Wertmuller said.

"The love is very authentic but in reality, it is not good for the Third World. Never have any faith in the rich because they'll always screw you around."

What is the most important thing Giannini has learned from working with Wertmuller?

"A love for work which gives me the strength to live."

but even their mind and conscience is defiled.

A court judgment that "The Body Politic" published an obscenity will take too long for those frantic to silence these troublemakers. First the punishment and then the trial, said Alice. The good officers of the law demonstrated How To Close Down A Newspaper. Don't merely seize copies of the alleged obscenity. Take everything you can move: subscription lists, advertising records, manuscripts for future publication, letters to the editor, personal mail to the staff, and even the accounts and the cheque-book.

Most of this material will undoubtedly have to be returned to its rightful owners when the case finally reaches court. But in the long meantime, the police can photocopy anything they wish. The public will be taught a lesson. If you have something to hide (such as a homosexual orientation) then don't subscribe to a paper the government doesn't approve of. Don't advertise in such a paper. Don't even write a letter to its editor.

We need to examine too, the psychological grounds of the outrage that led to the "Body Politic" raid. There is a telling passage in "Summerhill" in which A.S. Neill recognizes (like Blake) that our attitudes to sex are corrupted in infancy by taboos, and that 'unconsciously we remain to a large extent what conditioning in infancy made us: haters of sex and fears of sex.' 'Society,' says Erik Erikson in "Childhood and Society," is too blindly autocratic in demanding impossible feats of sublimation from her children. And yet it is for debating the impossibility of this sublimation and the right of children to sexual expression that "The Body Politic" was raided.

It is equally against the law for the gay and the non-gay to publish obscenities. But almost any kind of gay sex will be an obscenity to some heterosexuals. Even when gay sex is described in clinical terms, the very thought of it must be suppressed. Many readers will find the "Body Politic" article 'Men Loving Boys Loving Men' dull. It's certainly short on prurient interest or titillation.

Compare the frenzy of the attack on "The Body Politic" with the silent neglect of comparable heterosexual discussions readily available in Toronto. We don't want to play favorites, but take "Forum" for example. The January 1978 issue includes an explicit description of a man's sexual relationship with his seven-year-old step-daughter. "Best of Forum," also on sale at your local newsstand, contains an equally detailed report of a mother's sex with her twelve-year-old son. The article is titled 'A loving family', and the family is Canadian.

The history of the freedom of the press has been one of courageous, individual acts. Milton, Galileo, Paine, and William Lyon Mackenzie published in defiance of the laws of their time.

Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. Milton wrote. If we, as members of a university believe that text in Hart House, we cannot regard the raid on "The Body Politic" as irrelevant to our central concerns.

comfortable words to the silent majority. No one at "The Star" or "The Globe" sent to know for whom the bell tolled when "The Body Politic" was raided. The big dailies respect the big taboos. They need not tremble, for they neither desire nor dare to take liberties with the freedom of thought.

The Establishment is bound to the illusion by which it binds us. It would be impossible to maintain the fiction of a free press for all, if a modern Lord Chamberlain could arbitrarily censor a paper or play or book. Thus the government resorts to criminal charges. Allegations of obscenity, or conspiracy, or apprehended insurrection will stop the presses that offend the powerful.

But it is not the business of the state to dictate to the press what is debatable. It is not the business of the state, Milton says, to legislate private morality. Indeed, insofar as the state exercises prohibitions it prevents the very freedom of choice in moral issues that is essential to virtue. "God uses not," says Milton, "to captivate man under a perpetual childhood of prescription, but trusts him with the gift of reason to be his own choicer." Not, apparently, in Ontario!

What we have seen in the actions of the Attorney-General is what Milton calls "the most Dominican part of the Inquisition." There has been a great deal of apparently outraged morality, but it is at odds with the Biblical text that Milton quotes: 'Unto the pure all things are pure: but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure;

A negotiated peace plan will not bring an end to the poverty and social problems of the Middle East. Every year since her existence, Israel has paid dearly for some of the basic rights we take for granted. The fact is, the little bit you're holding back can mean the difference between life and death. If you think we're being a little melodramatic . . . ask the Soviet Jewish immigrants who need to be absorbed and retrained in their new environment. . . . ask the family of twelve living in a one-room apartment.

Now ask what you can do for them.

When a UJA canvasser calls to solicit you, make a moral decision. Your money will help Jews everywhere maintain Jewish social service agencies and Jewish schools.

So when the time comes to give — dig a little deeper. And involve yourself in the campaign.

Gymnasts Preparing For Upcoming Ontario Finals

By GLYNIS PETERS
Adverse weather conditions prevented Western from attending Saturday's Invitational Gymnastics meet, leaving only York and Toronto to battle it out.

York, coached by Natasa Bayon and Larry Bialagrecki are the defending Ontario Champions however, and provided some excellent competition. The final team scores of 118.50 to 118.15 gave York a win by only 0.35 points that augurs well for Toronto in the upcoming Ontario finals.

In the Intermediate class, York's Susan Baier, was named all-round champion, with a first place finish in vault, two 4ths and a 2nd. Toronto's Ruth Aggiss took second place, while teammate Janice Carsell claimed third spot.

Toronto placed several other individuals within the top six on each piece of equipment. Sue Rigney turned in a solid performance on the floor to place first with a score of 8.2. Sue Zielinski beat 3 strong York competitors on the beam to take a first with 7.45. On the parallel bars, which seemed to be the "downfall" of many of the gymnasts, a tie for first place diplomatically gave ribbons to both York and Toronto. Lorraine LeBlanc shared the honours with York's Marlene Boyle as they were both awarded a score of 7.65.

Coach Liz Swinton, feels that the Intermediates are "getting stronger with every meet" as they gain experience. At the moment they are working on developing more difficult routines. This is also applicable to the Junior team members, who did not compete at this meet. These first year gymnasts "are doing better with every meet they enter," says Swinton.

In the much smaller Senior Division Toronto's Janice Davy sailed to an easy all-round victory, taking first place in every event. Davy looked impressive on the vault where she executed a hand-spring that certainly deserved the 8.45 that the judges awarded her. Equally as strong was her floor performance, with two difficult tumbling sequences, that included two back flips and several other high difficulty moves.

It is not surprising that in view of her scores, all above 8.0, Coach Swinton feels "she is performing steadily". Her strong competition will come from a particular Western gymnast but the future looks bright if she continues her consistent performance.

Toronto will be hosting the OWIAA finals at the Benson Building on February 11. Eight universities will compete at Junior, Intermediate and Senior levels providing some excellent entertainment for all those interested in this fast growing sport.

The GAA needs you!

- Negotiations with the University for our second contract have not been going well. We have been offered a pay increase of only 5%, compared to the 9.4% increase won by the Faculty Association! To get more pay we need more bargaining power.
- We have been told a firm "NO!" to most of our demands for better working conditions. For example, the University refuses to grant provisions that would allow TAs to ascertain whether they will work the following year.
- The University now says that they will not back date the contract to September 1. This means that pay increases will only be effective from the date the contract is signed. The only way to respond to this latest move is to support the efforts of the GAA bargaining team by joining the GAA.
- As we now have a majority of TAs in the GAA, an opt-out check-off system will come into being soon, so you may as well join the union now and spend an extra $4 or $5 and get yourself that extra $200 you earned in back pay.

You need the GAA!

- The GAA bargains on your behalf whether or not you are a member, but if you are not a member you have no say in what we bargain for, nor what we accept as the contract.
- The Union fights for you if you have a problem. We filed and won grievances last year for people in Electrical Engineering and Philosophy, resulting in paid compensation of our members. We also help solve small hassles that may arise between you and your supervisor, through the use of a departmental steward.
- Our dues are low — 1.2% of your monthly TA salary. Dues will be lowered in proportion to membership growth.

Gymnasts Topple Queen's

The Men's Varsity Gymnastic Team met the Queen's Golden Gaels this past weekend in a dual meet in Kingston. The Blues were in fine form, dominating both the individual and team competitions. The meet was never close as the Blues rolled up 144.30 points to Queen's 94.0. In the individual all-around competition the top three places went to U of T gymnasts. Simon Smith placed first, Guy

Bourbeau was second, and Derek Wulff finished third. Despite some nagging injuries the Blues still showed excellent depth. Will Evans who is just getting over a bout with the flu turned in a strong performance as did Chester Makischuk who was bothered by a knee injury. The Blues hope to shake these minor injuries before the Ontario championships, at York on February 11th and the Canadian Championships in Winnipeg on February 24th.

Although relatively unknown until this season, the Men's Gym team is shaping up as one of the finest in the country. Their strong showing against Queen's on the weekend should help them as they travel to Hamilton this weekend to compete in the McMaster Invitational.

Sports Quickies

Thursday's storm forced the cancellation of a dual swim meet between the U of T and Colgate. While roads were clear enough by late Friday afternoon to make the trip to Syracuse, Blues coach, Robin Campbell feared being stranded after getting there... Tim Allan, All-Canadian tackle of the football Blues, was claimed by the Winnipeg Blue Bombers in the territorial-exemption phase of the C.F.L. draft. The Blue Bombers obtained the option of protecting the metro native in a deal made with the Toronto Argonauts... Allan is not the only Blue to be heading west. Mike Sokovnin earlier signed a contract with the Saskatchewan Roughriders... After two straight seasons without winning a game, Dick Aldridge has resigned as football coach for the York Heomen. Rumour has it, his assistants are now drawing straws and the loser will get the job... The Concordia University Stingers have had their wrists slapped by the CIAU for using an ineligible player. They have been placed on probation which means they cannot be included in the CIAU's weekly listing of the top 10 or appear on nationally-televised games... It has been announced that world class figure skater Stan Bohonok will be doing a short performance between periods of the Varsity hockey game on February 10.

Blues Fill Ottawa Net In Weekend Wins

By HOWARD DEANE

The Varsity Blues scored 19 goals on the way to two impressive victories, this past weekend, over the Ottawa Gee Gees. The Blues won 10-2 on Friday and 9-2 on Saturday in games played in the Henderson Ave. Arena.

This now brings their league record to thirteen wins and one tie.

Ottawa is in last place in the division, but "they play very tough in their own rink," commented coach Tom Watt, "We lost a 4-point game there last year."

It looked as if Watt was right as Ottawa jumped to an early 2-0 lead in the first game. The Blues were not playing well. Ottawa was checking hard and waiting for Toronto to make mistakes.

Blues centre, Doug Caines, put it succinctly, "They really like to bump and grind in their own rink."

However, this was the last time Ottawa was in contention all weekend. The Blues came back to score 18 straight goals over the span of the two games.

Many players felt that the arena was inadequate in many respects. The temperature hovered just slightly above zero. The dressing rooms were old squash courts. The time clock didn't work. The players bench was too short (only on the Blues' side). The timekeepers couldn't keep the penalties straight and the goal creases were too big.

Varsity five year veteran Doug Herridge elaborated: "It'd be warmer playing on the Rideau Canal." One unidentified bystander added: "They just took the horses out and made it into an arena."

Friday night the Blues were lucky to end the first period with a 2-2 tie. Dan D'Alvise put the Blues on the scoreboard and Herridge tied the score with an unassisted shorthanded goal after they had fallen behind.

At the beginning of the second period, Alex Jeans scored what would have been the go ahead goal. However, the ref disallowed it because Dan Tsubouchi was in the crease.

After goals by Joe Grant, Caines, and Rob Gemmell, the Blues were up 5-2.

During the third period, Toronto looked even stronger as Tsubouchi scored after only 43 seconds. Charlie "Too Tall" Hughes, Cary Farelli, Grant, and Frank Davis each scored to up the count to 10-2.

Farelli shocked all 98 fans when he scored his final goal on a nifty shot from behind his back.

The third period was a rough one as evidenced by the penalties; seven for Ottawa and three for Toronto. As Caines put it, "They (Ottawa) were playing pretty chippy, and taking shots when the refs weren't looking."

The Ottawa team seemed unorganized as they were often late on the ice for the start of the periods, and at one point got two delay of game penalties.

This gave the Blues a two-man advantage. Watt pulled goalie Dave Jenner, giving the Blues three extra attackers. They didn't score then, but did so after Jenner was back in net.

In Saturday's game the Blues came out flying. They were checking hard and completely dominating play. They outshot Ottawa 22-7 in the first period and took a 2-0 lead into the squash court (dressing room). Gemmell and Tsubouchi supplied the goals.

The second period saw Toronto increase their lead to 7-0. Three of the five second period goals were scored by defencemen; two by Rocci

Pagnello and one by Gemmell. The other two were by Farelli.

Over the two games, eight of the nineteen goals were scored by defencemen.

The standout pair of defencemen was again Pagnello and Gemmell. Between them they had ten points on the weekend. Last weekend they had fourteen.

Farelli, second in league scoring behind Caines, had an excellent weekend gaining four goals and five assists. He earned a hat trick in the second game.

The Blues did not play well in the third period and were outshot 15-6. However, both teams scored two goals, with Davis and Farelli scoring for Toronto.

Jenner's shutout bid was ruined at 12:40 of the third period when Ottawa's Brian Chambers beat him on a breakaway, setting the score at 8-1. They scored again five minutes later, as Luc Prud'Homme laid a backhand over Jenner's shoulder.

Farelli ended the scoring with little more than a minute left, as he picked a puck off the post and plopped it in.

Despite the rough, hardchecking play, there were no serious injuries, except perhaps for frostbite.

Blues Take Top Honours Weather Beats Western,

By GLYNIS PETERS

The first round of the Ontario Indoor Archery finals were disrupted, as were many other events this week-end, by the severe weather conditions we have been experiencing. Western University, the defending indoor Champions, were unable to get out of snow-bound London to attend Saturday's meet. Four Queen's archers managed to reach Toronto but the remaining two members of their team were left at home, side-lined by the flu.

Toronto had a good day, however, and managed to come out on top overall, recording a total of 1,761 points out of a possible 2,400. Queen's took second place with 1,671 and Guelph tied up third spot by shooting 1,493.

Western will have their work cut out from them if they wish to reclaim their title. In the second round that will be held in London on February 10 and 11, they will be required to shoot two rounds on Friday in order to bring them up to date with the other teams. Bearing in mind the demands of the week-end in terms of fatigue and concentration, it will certainly be to their disadvantage to compete for three consecutive days instead of only two. Obviously, this development can only be to Toronto's benefit.

Looking at the individual results, Toronto turned in a strong performance, placing three archers in the top five. Linda Kazienko of Guelph wrapped up first place with 502 out of a possible 600 points. Coming second with 483 points was a very ill Julie Ford, who in view of her condition should not have been competing. Queen's' Julie Robinson, took third spot with 468 and Patty Duncan with 453 and Marie Maniw with 438 rounded out Toronto's domination by sewing up fourth and fifth spots. Barb Paluch, usually a strong contender for Toronto, was plagued by equipment problems and finished behind Maniw. Various assorted injuries also hampered Toronto but hopefully all these problems will be ironed out before the second round.

The second round takes place on February 10 and 11 at Western and should prove interesting as the defending champs make their bid to catch up to the other teams.

The Race Is On!

By PHILIP LIBMAN

This is the first in a series of articles on the upcoming Governing Council campaign. In today's article, four of the five candidates for the two positions as reps for full-time Arts and Science undergraduates, and the three candidates for the two positions of full-time undergraduate professional faculties reps, were asked two questions: 1) What has been and is your student governmental and political experience, and any other activities that would be relevant for Governing Council? What do you think is the major issue for the campaign and for Governing Council for next year? (Frank Pegola was unavailable for comment. His comments will appear in Friday's issue.)

The Faculty of Arts and Science has five candidates: Donald Guloien, a Commerce and Finance major (U.C. II), said the major issue will be resource-allocation problems. "There must be a reasoned, non-antagonistic approach to governing, and I have the experience necessary for Governing Council."

Guloien has been or is presently on the Faculty of Arts and Science General Committee, the Social Sciences Curriculum Committee, the Commerce Curriculum Committee, the Hart House Board of Stewards, the Hart House Finance Committee, the Hart House Capital Expenditures Committee and the Commerce Students Association Executive.

James Hawker, General Arts (Vic II) said: "I have no experience in student politics. I have experience in running my own life, and that is all the experience I need. The major issue is, who will do the job? The issue is whether or not I will do a good job. A good job is thinking and caring about the issues."

Jules Barry Bloch, Poli Sci (Erindale I), has student political experience from the CEGEP system in Montreal. "As a student at Vanier CEGEP I was the Student government external liaison officer, and I formed a caucus of anglophone post-secondary students representing all the anglophone CEGEPs, Concordia University and McGill students. I was the caucus' chairman and spokesman. I also was an alternative rep on the Academic Council of Vanier. At Erindale, I am a DJ on CFRE. The major issue is the need for more involvement from the suburban campuses. I want to see Erindale and Scarborough as more active participants on Governing Council. Right now the only thing that ties us is the bus."

David Jones, Political Science, New III, lists his political experience as student council (SAC) vice-president in charge of the corporation, SAC rep for New College; and on the Varsity Board of Directors, New College Council, Association of Student Councils (AOSC) Board of Directors, National Union of Students (NUS) Central Committee. Jones said that the major issue is the external review of the university, the Macdonald Report. "Its recommendations can have serious implications for students."

The professional faculties have three candidates to choose from. Richard Johnston, Engineering Science IV, is the Engineering Society rep to the Engineering

Innis courses may be axed

By GEORGE M. COOK

"It was one of the most valuable experiences I had at the college. The university must provide an alternative and I don't consider these courses inferior." That was the sentiment expressed by Pat Burchell, a former student in Innis College's Independent Studies program, at a meeting of the Faculty of Arts and Science subcommittee on college courses on Monday.

The sub-committee, chaired by Arts and Science dean Arthur Kruger, is currently reviewing the Independent Studies program at Innis.

Kruger recommended in a letter to Innis principal William Saywell dated December 21 that the five resource people now involved in the Innis program be cut and that experts be substituted.

The Independent Studies program has been reviewed by the Faculty of Arts and Science every year for the past 10 years. So far there have been no significant cuts.

This year, however, the Innis College budget may be reduced by 3 per cent. Loss of this and other revenue could amount to $28,000.

In light of this the Innis College Council ratified a report from the council's Academic Affairs committee in December specifying that 16 courses, including all of those in Independent Studies, be cut in the event of loss of funds.

Debate in the sub-committee on college courses however has centred around the "academic excellence" of the Independent Studies program. The qualifications of the five resource people involved have been questioned.

Asked what the effect of the committee's preliminary proposals to cut back the program might be, Saywell said, "No doubt there would be a lower number of students taking Independent Studies, but to what degree the numbers would drop, I don't know."

The sub-committee on college courses will meet in closed session Friday. A decision regarding the Independent Studies program could come at that time. It will have to be ratified by the committee on Academic Standards Friday afternoon.

Dave Reinboth and Mark Weisdorf, president and vice-president respectively of the Innis College Student Society (ICSS), arrived late for the Monday meeting wearing three-piece suits. When they spoke neither identified themselves as representatives of ICSS. They referred to themselves only as Innis College students.

"We'd like to have a chance to evolve policy at the council level," Reinboth said, referring to the Innis College council, an advisory body of 44 members half of whom are students. Independent Studies is a unique program at Innis not found elsewhere at the university," he added.

There are currently 110 students in the Independent Studies program at Innis.

Most students found employment

By TOM KUHN

About 95 per cent of U of T students found summer employment last year according to a survey released last week by the U of T Career Counselling and Placement Centre.

Nevertheless, a full 20 per cent of the student users of the Placement Centre who responded to the questionnaire mailed out last August, found it impossible to return to the university with funds made over the summer.

Even the 20 per cent figure may be low, because many students who said they made enough money to return also stated that they were dependent on OSAP, said Eve Paley, who designed and wrote the Placement Centre report.

The high number of students not returning "sort of balances off the rosy picture of the rest of the survey," said Paley. She was surprised at the high employment rate, the salary, and the number of course-related jobs, she said.

"You would expect summer employment to reflect general conditions. Some employers may have laid off permanent help. They find, however, that they get behind, and they need part-time help," said Paley in attempting to explain the rosy side of the survey.

The students surveyed were persistent. 89 per cent of them visited the Placement Centre more than once, and 36 per cent actually visited the centre six or more times. In addition, 60 per cent of the students responding applied to six or more jobs.

"Applying to six employers is not anywhere near an effort. That can be done very quickly. A really good effort would be applying to 100 places. If someone applied to 100 places and did not find a job, then I'd really be concerned," said Paley.

Students' inexperience in applying for jobs is their most serious difficulty, said Paley. "A lot of people don't know how to present themselves in the right manner to employers. They understate their skills," Paley said.

"Students often don't understand themselves and their interests, nor what their talents are. Applying for jobs is a skill but it is a skill easily learned," said Paley.

Only 16 per cent of the student respondents to the survey actually got jobs through the Placement Centre.

The Placement Centre's role is basically supplemental, said Paley. "The purpose of the centre is more to help students get skills of their own and to help in their job search," Paley added.

"Only 40 per cent of the jobs available are listed in placement services, manpower, and other employment agencies. Sixty per cent of students last summer got jobs from personal contact, which sort of proves the point. There are jobs out there but the students have to work to find out about them, and get them," said Paley.

Many students got jobs in manual labor because they are traditionally higher paying, said Paley. Construction companies don't even need to advertise to get enough applications because of their high pay scale, she pointed out.

Graduates try again

By GEORGE COOK

The Graduate Assistants Association (GAA), representing teaching assistants across campus, met in closed-door session yesterday to discuss current contract negotiations with the university and plan counter strategy for the university's proposals.

Negotiations between the GAA and the university administration broke off January 9. Yesterday conciliation began between the Association and the administration.

The major issues, GAA president Steve Baer said after the Hart House meeting are money, union security and retroactive pay. At the moment teaching assistants are not guaranteed that any pay increase gained in the current negotiations will be retroactive to the expiration of the old contract.

"Parker led us to believe it was assured," Baer said. (John Parker is labor relations manager at U of T.)

The GAA also wants an "opt-out check off" for its members which would require all teaching assistants who did not wish to be members of GAA to opt out of the association. At present members must join before they are considered members.

Roughly half of the 2,029 graduate teaching assistants at the university are members of the association.

Asked if he expected GAA members to be laid off due to cutbacks Baer responded: "We haven't been told that. The Chant letter of 1975 to the GAA said teaching assistants would not suffer the brunt of cut backs." This letter is still in effect according to the U of T bargaining team, Baer said.

This does not however mean teaching assistants don't feel the effects of cut backs, Baer said. He claimed they are now required to do more work than formerly.

New College victim of holiday heist

By PAUL F. ROONEY

New College was the scene of the crime over the Christmas holidays when two paintings valued at approximately $600 were stolen from the college's staff lounge. The Indian Woodland paintings were discovered missing at the end of the holidays by New College Principal Andrew Baines and Dean of Women Audrey Taylor. They are both insured.

The theft is only a recent example of a problem that has plagued the college for some time. Typewriters, lamps, and rugs have disappeared and this past weekend two of the college's graduate photographs, which hang in the main hallway, were taken.

Principal Baines felt that with the exception of the typewriters, the thefts were not motivated by financial reasons. It is his opinion that the paintings were taken to adorn someone's living quarters, and the grad photos were taken by inebriated students. Indeed the paintings would be hard to "fence" in that they are easily identifiable and photographs of them have been given to the police, according to Baines.

Baines said security at the college is almost nonexistent, with the problem being compounded by the large number of entrances. "It's an easy mark," he remarked.

The Varsity — Arun Mehra

That's not art deco, it's a blank wall.

The principal circulated a notice asking for information about the theft, and for the return of the paintings. He said he has received no response so far.

Both campus police and Metro Police were informed of the theft. Police Constable Nahedy, heading up the continuing investigation for the campus police, said he had no leads at all, but added, "We never give up hope."

Pollution is not everybody's bag

By ROBERT FIFE

Only six people were present on Friday to hear the Toronto Panel on Great Lakes Pollution deliver its recommendations to the Ministry of the Environment. Ron Reid, chairman of the panel, said he was "stumped" by the lack of public interest.

The Toronto group was formed last October along with seven other regional groups to conduct studies for the International Joint Commission (IJC) on Pollution of the Great Lakes. Reid stated Friday that the "government's first priority should be to upgrade degraded waters in the Great Lakes, especially those which pose a public health hazard now, or will if present trends continue."

The panel concluded that if the quality of the Great Lakes is to be improved then there must be a "review of pollution control legislation to improve its effectiveness and efficiency." It also emphasized the need for a major public education program and the creation of a central co-ordination group to promote Great Lakes water quality.

Responding to questions from the floor, Reid was asked by Norman Wei, owner of a Toronto consulting firm, about the lack of public perception of Great Lakes pollution. "It seems," said Reid, "that the public is simply not interested in non-point (indirect) pollution."

Wei, however, disagreed. He criticized the panel and the IJC for failing to get the public involved. The panels established by the IJC are a classic case of "bureaucrats talking to bureaucrats," said Wei. In his view they had failed to get the right people involved.

"If the press and the public are not involved," said Wei, "then the politicians won't be interested which means the panels recommendations will not be realized." He said that the panels "should direct more of their energies towards creating public pressure that will force the politicians to respond to Great Lakes pollution."

The Toronto Panel and the IJC's work are covered by the Great Lakes Quality Agreement signed by Canada and the United States in 1972. It is expected to take a full two years before a final report is made.

Self-determination in Mid East

By ERIC STARKMAN

Peace can never be achieved in the Middle East unless "a legitimate formula is reached that recognizes the national aspirations of all parties," said Professor Elia Zureik.

Speaking Monday in the first of a lecture series sponsored by the Arab Students Association, Zureik warned an audience of approximately 60 that the "legitimate rights of others cannot be determined by outside forces" and that the Palestinians must be allowed to determine their own fate.

Zureik, a visiting professor in U of T's department of Near Eastern Studies, stated that he believed the Palestine Liberation Organization is "in firm command" as representative of Palestinian interests and that he supported the PLO plan for an independent Palestinian state on the West Bank. He asserted that PLO representatives must be present during any negotiations regarding Palestinian interests.

Zureik described the Palestinian position as "a non-unified, non-ideological movement between leftists and rightist forces." This hybrid position, said Zureik, developed as a result of Palestinians always being dependent on other Arab governments for military and economic support. He said that "although the Palestinians have failed to establish a deep-rooted base in the Arab masses" he believed that the Arab countries were sympathetic to the Palestinian cause.

Referring to Egypt as the main protagonist in the Arab camp, Zureik suggested that "as long as Egyptian sovereignty is affirmed, Egypt will reach a separate accord with Israel." He said Egypt's bourgeoisie would welcome an economic association with Israel because it would further their own economic interests. He added that Egypt would like to abandon the "hot potato" issue of the PLO and allow the Palestinians to independently pursue their own interests.

Zureik concluded that a separate settlement between Egypt and Israel would weaken Arab unity, and that he hoped one day Egyptians "would settle their accounts with Sadat."

The professor said that ultimately Syria would recognize Israel but would insist on the return of the Golan Heights. He said Syria would probably accept a United Nations peace-keeping force in the Golan, as well as a limited Israeli presence. Zureik predicted that Syria will work to lessen its dependence on the Soviet Union and try to prevent a schism from developing within the PLO.

ELECTION ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

• FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

Students: Seats available - 2 in each of Victoria, Trinity, New, Erindale Colleges
Seats available - 1 in each of University, Woodsworth Colleges

Faculty:

Departmental

Humanities Seats available - 1 in each of EAS, ENG, FRE, GER, HIS, ITA, LIN, NES, REL, SIS
Life Sciences Seats available - 1 in BOT
Physical Sciences Seats available - 1 in each of AST, CHM, GLG
Social Sciences Seats available - 1 in ANT
Erindale Seats available - 3

Divisional

Humanities Seats available - 1
Life Sciences Seats available - 3

Unemployment crisis

In recent weeks tax incentives, job creation schemes and "restructuring of the economy" have been offered to students as "solutions" to unemployment by Ed Broadbent, Mel Watkins, John Crisp and others.

All the solutions which have been called for by the NDP, the OFL and the CLC, and the "Communist" Party of Canada have been tried before in Canada and many other countries and all have failed to arrest the increasing mass unemployment in Canada and throughout the capitalist and revisionist world. All the demands for "action" and the "pressure for policy changes" — be it for "job creation schemes" or "incentives" — have been taken up to one degree or another already by the Trudeau government.

All the "solutions" of the NDP, trade union bigwigs and revisionists have failed because they are all based on the premise that unemployment is a question of "bad government policy," or "bad management of the economy" and that things would be fine for all if there was a "good government policy," a policy of "full employment" (by which they mean, in fact, unemployment of 5%) and "good management of the economy." In claiming this, they plead with the people that we should be loyal to the capitalist system, to "the democratic process" and have faith in and rely on the state of the rich, which attacks us every day on all fronts, to provide the solutions to our problems.

During the 1960's and early 1970's, state expenditures on education, health, social services and other facilities grew rapidly, in connection with the expansion into Canada of U.S. imperialism during this period. The U.S. imperialists required many trained workers in various technical areas, in order to develop the infrastructure and services necessary for the escalated plunder of the land and labour of the Canadian people by U.S. imperialism. As a result, massive propaganda was issued, urging the youth to find a future for themselves by "seeking an education." Many new universities and community colleges were built to train the youth to meet the needs of the U.S. imperialists.

But today, in the current worsening economic crisis which arises out of the basic contradictions inherent in the capitalist system, this degree is no longer a passport to a prosperous future and increasingly large numbers of graduates are unable to find work.

Marxism-Leninism teaches that unemployment is an incurable wound of the capitalist system and that nothing short of the revolutionary overthrow of the capitalist system by the working class and the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat, a socialist society, can ever eliminate unemployment completely.

The bourgeoisie has absolutely no way out of this crisis; it is utterly incapable of resolving the fundamental contradictions of capitalism which have given rise to the crisis. It cannot eliminate the mass unemployment. In fact, the only response of the reactionary bourgeoisie to the crisis is to shift the burden onto the backs of the working class and people; to make the people pay.

WHAT SHOULD THE STUDENTS DO?

Unemployment is a practical problem that students are actively taking up for solution. Students must demand jobs and resist the shifting of the burden of the economic crisis onto their backs. This resistance can only be waged by students relying on their own efforts and by directing their struggle against the main enemy — the reactionary bourgeoisie and U.S. imperialism. Students must oppose the line given by the student careerists' leaders and revisionists that they should get on their knees before the government and beg for "job creation schemes" and that in this way the problem of unemployment can be eliminated under the capitalist system. No illusions can be harboured by the students in the course of their resistance struggle of the ability of the capitalist system to eliminate unemployment.

The basic interests of the students are the same as the basic interests of the proletariat. They are against the shifting of the burden of the economic crisis onto the backs of the people and against the whole repressive rule of the rich and their state.

It is the reactionary bourgeoisie, the U.S. imperialists and their state which are attacking the students as well as the proletariat, the Native people, the immigrants, especially those from Asia, Africa and Latin America, and the nation of Quebec. And it is they who, in the midst of severe economic, political, social and cultural crises are promoting lies to divert the people and keep them divided.

At the same time as the students must resist these attacks, they cannot limit their struggle solely to resistance. Students must take up the banner of Make The Rich Pay! CP(CM-L) has advanced the slogan Make The Rich Pay! as the revolutionary way out of the crisis, as the line and slogan which represents the basic interests of the proletariat to not only resist the shifting of the burden of the economic crisis onto their backs but also to launch offensives against the rich and their state.

Students play a tremendous role in this historic struggle. They must fight to defend their basic interests and against the bourgeois decadent educational system. They must fight to make education serve the working class and to make the rich pay for the education of the sons and daughters of the proletariat.

Cutbacks solved

In an age of diminishing deference for our traditions, I feel the university must be able to face its problems without failing to pay heed to its great heritage. In the current cutbacks crisis the university appears to be leaning in the dangerous direction of sacrificing pedagogical standards in the interests of economy. A much wiser strategy would be to create a global bi-monthly lottery sponsored by U of T. As a crass commercial venture, the university would naturally be reluctant to involve itself at the expense of its dignity but this can be overcome if the traditional pecuniary incentive were replaced with a more academic reward such as an honorary doctorate.

This would not only solve the cutbacks problem but would follow in the tradition of bestowing academic rewards on those who pull universities out of their financial dumps. Think of its appeal to the broad masses pining to break the L.D., D.H.L. and D.Litt monopolies held by an elite corps of industrial magnates, politicians and dying professors. If the lottery proves successful, which I have no doubt it will, we could introduce quarterly bonus draws for naming buildings, scholarships and Chairs. We could also look into visiting professorships for getting the right number but the wrong series or positions in Commerce for getting the last four numbers.

English tests

So often, it seems, student representatives adopt a union mentality in dealing with student issues. Whenever The Enemy, the U of T administration, makes a suspicious move, some politically inclined student considers it a call to duty and begins exploring the possibility that some, any member of the group encompassed by his ripe sense of student solidarity may suffer.

When our saviour is a Varsity editor, an editorial such as Wednesday's can result. There, outrage and indignation is shockingly given vent to in response to U of T's gentle new policy aimed at restoring the curse of basic English literacy.

The writer is not, however, so overcome by the injustice as to forget that irritating fact of U of T life, student sluggishness. In order to rouse us sleepy-heads, therefore, he distorts facts. Just a little.

"Beginning in 1980 10,000 U of T students will have to pass an English proficiency (literacy) test or leave the university," he trumpets with all the earnestness of a game hunter denouncing a gun law. "As many as half of these students may end up leaving university."

The Varsity has yet to report it, but if the Globe and Mail is to be given any credibility, students will be allowed to continue their studies without interruption for another year if they fail the test. Only if the student fails the test a second time, a year after the first, will he be denied readmission.

The writer goes on to give perfunctory voice to the familiar and tiresome paranoia with which some people can be counted on to react toward business, government, and anything else that's too big to be knocked down with a flying rock. The pernicious and hidden motive of the general committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science is unveiled as just "one more attempt to reduce the number of people the government is willing to invest in."

Students should be the first to applaud a move which will in a reasonable way raise standards, strengthen the integrity of their degrees, and perhaps most important, force those students who try to ignore their illiteracy to finally face their serious problem and fight it.

A concern for students would be better appreciated if it were more enlightened. Canada's future has nothing to gain from a philosophy among today's students which aces the naively self-centered and antagonistic approach of contemporary special interest groups, indifferent to the common good.

Humphrey dead

The latest issue of Workers Vanguard being hawked in the free speech area of Sid Smith bore the banner headline "HUMPHREY DEAD AT LAST." I find the headline to be disgustingly poor taste regardless of Humphrey's stand on the Viet Nam War, and hope that the childish authors of the headline (and undoubtedly the story that follows) will grow up.

Faculty Council. He is on the executive of the faculty council and the Engineering Society. Johnston was the rep to the faculty council for his class and is the speaker of the Engineering Society Council. The issue, as he sees it, is the university's tight financing. "Attempts will be made to save money where it generates the least noise. In light of this, reps will be fighting for the quality of education, including teaching and student services."

Lorne Merkur, Industrial Engineering II, is the class

rep to the Industrial Engineering Departmental Council. He said fees are the major issue. "Their possible increases, the visa fee, and the availability of money for tutors and departments will all have to be faced next year."

Mark Wax, Medicine II, has been the Meds SAC rep for two years, and this year he's on the University Government Commission. Wax has been on the Medical Society for two years and has been involved in a number of extra-curricular activities. "The major issue is the upcoming external review of the Governing Council. Whether we follow the changes recommended in the Macdonald report is the issue."

O'Riordan cries foul

With regard to the bizarre and confused article of Philip Libman's which appeared in the Monday, January 30 edition of The Varsity entitled "Candidate snowed out of race", I would just like to inform you that I did not state that I thought that Mr. David Jones was the only valid candidate for Governing Council in the Arts and Science constituency, nor did I say anything about the "oppressive policies of Simcoe Hall." I also categorically deny saying that I thought that the matter of Mr. Jones's invalidation was just a "technicality", and that I was confident he would win his appeal. The invalidation was a serious matter and I know that Mr. Jones is most certainly treating it as such. Also, I did not drive to Mr. Jones's home in Alliston as I do not possess a driver's license.

I am thoroughly disgusted with some of the shabby reporting and editing evidenced in The Varsity throughout this year. This is just another instance of such. I am particularly annoyed when City Editor, Heather Hill, phones me up the night before the article's presentation to clarify, supposedly, some aspects of the story involved and then in the story blatant errors and misquotations appear anyway.

It may seem like I'm making a lot of fuss over nothing, but a legalistic appeal procedure involving the taking of statements, etc. is involved. I only hope that The Varsity's journalistic incompetence will not prejudice Mr. Jones's case.

Anyway, to quote somebody or other, "lies and slander" (sic), I'm used to it.

Brian O'Riordan, University Government Commissioner, SAC

Ed's note:

The Varsity stands by its reporter's assertion that Mr. O'Riordan said what the article states; his notes confirm this; and a witness to the remarks made at Simcoe Hall has verified that Mr. O'Riordan did indeed say, "The only valid candidate has been invalidated by the oppressive policies of Simcoe Hall."

Mr. O'Riordan furthermore said in a subsequent telephone interview, as the article states and the reporter's notes confirm, that the invalidation of Mr. Jones' nomination (because of lack of proof of citizenship) is a "technicality", and expressed his confidence of winning the appeal.

In the telephone conversation with the City Editor, Mr. O'Riordan, when asked the time the nomination was filed, volunteered the information, "We drove to Alliston to fetch the proof of citizenship." One can still go to Alliston even if one doesn't possess a driver's license. The Varsity delegates to the Christmas CUP conference went to Halifax even though none is licensed to fly a plane.

I am thoroughly disgusted with some of the shabby reporting and editing evidenced in The Varsity throughout this year.

I also categorically deny saying that I thought that the matter of Mr. Jones's invalidation was just a "technicality", and that I was confident he would win his appeal.

New Faces presents: Stage Fright

By ALLAN LAMARTINE

Forty-eight people on stage for the finale? All singing, all acting, all hoofing it? (Up, down; one, two; knees up; kick! . . .) And there's a woman in the front row coping with the ordeal with the yawning aplomb of a prima ballerina on a hard slum, while the gent two down desperately looks from side to side — how the hell are they doing that anyway? they doing that anyway?

It dawns on the observer that he's missed a turn somewhere and that this is not the Radio City Music Hall. And that somewhat ruffled figure ruling the roost isn't quite the impresario we'd thought the inheritors of George M. Cohan and Busby Berkeley had to be.

Gradually the readjustment sets in, geography and context fall back into their appointed slots and you're staring at the halls of New College and at Jim Betts, writer, director, and deus ex machina of that institution's annual revue, "New Faces".

"The main thing," he's saying, "that makes this show different from the others on campus (and that's only Skule Night and the Vic major musical — there aren't many) is that in our show there's no chorus. It's written to fit the talents of the people we have working on it. Everyone gets their time in the spotlight, unless, of course, they'd rather stay in the background. Obviously when you're working with a group of fifty people some are going to have bigger parts than others but we have no stars."

To those of us who have had any commerce with aspiring actors this may sound an almost impossible goal to achieve. Somehow everyone in college productions seems to be striving to catch the attention of the talent scouts who aren't out there, but ought to be. To instill a spirit of community, to break through the them-us, chorus-stars barrier presents a major hurdle to the director.

Five Year Tradition

Betts does have tradition and his individual experience on his side. New Faces has existed only as long as he has been in charge. When the idea of having a talent night at New College surfaced five years ago, the powers that were attempted to draft the demi-mythic Briane Nasimok as director-coordinator. Nasimok was, however, caught up with his commitments to the Canadian Opera Company and suggested Jim Betts. The powers approved and

New Faces began its process of transformation, from a series of acts ("He juggles; she sings; and later on we have an animal act.") to an ordered sequence with at least a thematic unity.

Originally the show was to have been cast written, but even when this was the nominal policy Betts wrote the greater part of the show. For this year's Stage Fright (which derives its thematic basis, loosely, very loosely, from Gail Sheehy's Passages) the director served as writer-in-chief while soliciting material from the world-at-large. This material appeared in the form of lyrics in search of music, music in need of lyrics, or sketches in need of editing. All of these he provided.

"There are limits. Inexperienced actors feel far more at home with broad comedy than with anything more serious. But we try to achieve a balance. We want the show to look as professional as possible, not as if a bunch of people got together two weeks in advance, threw together some sketches and are more concerned with amusing one another than with communicating anything to an audience. It's more fun doing comedy, and New Faces is as much a social as a theatrical experience. I don't want to force anything, which is why we stopped the stages of personal crisis represented in the show short of old age. But the actors should have to extend themselves."

Hard Work, Long Hours

Setting the task of stretching the emotional range aside, the participants in Stage Fright have all been threatening to hyper-extend their time-tables. Betts declined to estimate how many hours an average member of the cast would have spent since October (when rehearsals began), but my own calculations would set the total at

A scene from the 'Cope Show' sequence of Stage Fright.

vargfe Campus

Each year at this time, three musical productions play to campus audiences at Hart House and New College. The Vic Musical, New Faces and Skulenite are a part of U of T tradition. Today's vargfeature provides a glimpse of each production — its history, and how it survives from year to year.

upwards of one hundred and fifty, and probably many more. "We may cause the occasional failure, but any campus activity can do that." In spite of this total, the pitfalls which loom, and the improbability that anyone is going to leap from the cast of New Faces into a leading role at Stratford, about fifty percent of this year's cast can be expected to return next year. If there is a next year.

The tradition is strongly enough established after five years that New Faces will probably continue. It will, however, go on without Jim Betts. "Twenty hours a week through October and November, more in what there is of December, and about twelve hours a day in January. It's a lot of time, especially when you're trying to do anything else. And there's only so much one person can do. I think we reached a peak last year, one that we'll probably match this year, when the show pulls together. But . . ."

Even before the interview ends the community is gathering. The dancers are assembling and comparing notes on the contortions necessitated by lab reports and essays which can't be delayed, and the show with its unextendable deadline of February 1, 2, 3 and 4. The director listens and prepares the cast for their evening run. And I wonder if the program will include his credit as father confessor.

Eng. Soc.'s Skule Nite 7T8

By SCOTT JOLLIFFE
and PAUL BAKER

The origins of Skule Nite (pronounced "School Night") can be traced as far back as the early years of the century. At that time there was no show as such, but frequently students and professors would perform short skits and musical ensembles at social events during the year. In 1920 the Engineering Society Executive appointed a Stunt Night Committee to bring together all these scattered dramatic efforts into one show. As it turned out, there was so much interest in this idea that it was decided Massey Hall should be rented for the performance. On March 2, 1921, a thirteen-act review called 'NGYNRS SPASMS' was performed with overwhelming success. The show included short skits such as 'Laboratory Lapses' and 'The Adventures of Chloreen', as well as musical and instrumental interludes all written and performed by "schoolmen". A relatively new addition to the Faculty, the Toike Oikestra, was in the pit, and, as history records it, was the mainstay of the show.

The great success of this show brought "NGYNRS SPASMS" back to Massey Hall the next year. As in the year before, tickets were sold at fifty cents each to cover costs (in those days it cost $198.13 to rent the Hall). The show in its second season was again extremely well received.

The format of School Night that was established in 1923 continued for over twenty years, combining a variety of theatrical reviews with displays, competitions and dancing. In 1924 an original play called "Insomnia" was performed in which Ralph Kerr, the author, played the leading lady (all female parts up until 1944 were played by Jane Quibel and Mark Ewan in a scene from SkuleNite 7T7.

"schoolmen"). The play was a humorous prophecy of the faculty and the university thirty years hence and, like much of the humour today in the Toike and Skule Nite '78, was a satire of present life in the university.

The School Night of 1929 (or Stunt Night as it was sometimes called) presented one skit in which the Varsity staff was convicted of "many unmentionable crimes" and the editor was subsequently hanged. The Club displays that were scattered throughout the House also added fun and enjoyment to the evening's activities.

This popularity continued through the late thirties and early forties.

Although the 'Midway', the club displays, and most of the sports competitions were slowly disappearing from the list of attractions, the 'Revue' itself was becoming the most important part of the evening.

School Nite 1944 marked a changing point in the history of this social event. Because Hart House Theatre was unavailable that year, the entire show was moved to the Royal Ontario Museum (why ROM of all places is a mystery). Timber beams and columns, a timber ramp, a helicopter (loaned by the T.T.C.), a totem pole, a tandem bicycle, spotlights, backdrops, platforms, a bed and mattress, a switchboard,

Vic Musical: Company

By CONNIE FILLETTI

Last year marked the fiftieth anniversary of the Victoria College Music Club (VCMC). Established in 1927-28, the club's first production was Edward German's musical Merrie England which ran for four days, and enjoyed critical success.

The January 25, 1928 issue of The Varsity contained a review of the production, praising it for its "excellent chorus and solo singing." Also, it was hailed as a "successful performance of a pleasing and colourful presentation."

How has the Vic musical fared over the decades?

Musicals go through phases, according to Graham Jackson, director of Stephen Sondheim's Company being offered as this year's presentation by the VCMC.

The thirties, forties, and fifties saw productions of the standard boy meets girl type. Student involvement in the productions was fair as were the sizes of the audiences that attended Vic musical performances.

The late sixties showed an increase in student participation in the productions. Such plays as Can Can, Mame and The Music Man were being performed.

Jackson described this as a time when musicals generated lots of enthusiasm and attracted people to participate in them.

"Vic musicals in the late 1960's were very slick and professional but you don't get that as much these days. I don't know why, because the club always had a good reputation and is entrenched at the college. It's the climate of the time. You don't get a turnout for auditions and an audience isn't here anymore," he says.

Jackson believes musicals are currently in a bad phase with audiences declining progressively over the past five years. One reason university musical theatre doesn't have the draw it used to have, says Jackson, is the availability of so much alternative theatre in Toronto.

Jackson is personally drawn to musicals because he finds them more challenging to direct than plays.

What prompts student involvement in the productions? "They like singing; that's the first draw," Jackson says. "The music does it all the time."

This year's co-producers of the Vic musical, Catherine McCready and Tim Redmann, place entertaining audiences at the top of their list of reasons for participating.

McCready, a second year drama major, plays the role of Susan in Company and is president of the VCMC in addition to being a co-producer. She says there is a lot of personal gratification that comes with being active in the production. "I experience great joy when I realize I have entertained the audience."

Redmann agrees, claiming that involvement for one's own gratification alone will inhibit gaining the correct rapport with an audience.

Chipper Thompson, a fourth year English major, plays David in the musical. Aside from hoping to go on to a career in the theatre, Thompson has been associated with the VCMC for four years because he finds performing in musicals a challenge.

Thompson was a major force behind having Company chosen as this year's presentation; he hopes it will attract a student audience. Why?

"The central theme is relationships involving younger people having modern experiences," explains Thompson.

John Hughes, musical director of the production, says his most difficult problem has been getting the proper toughness from the troupe which the music in Company indicates about the people. He describes the musical as different as far as the music goes, because of its sophistication.

Some luminaries once connected with the Vic musical include film maker Norman Jewison, Ontario's Lieutenant Governor Pauline McGibbon and musical theatre writer Jim Betts.

Company was chosen last year by the VCMC executive. Auditions began in early October with rehearsals immediately following and continuing until last night, when the musical play opened at Hart House.

What do the people involved with the Vic music club hope to accomplish?

"To put on the best show possible and entertain their audiences. That's what they'd ideally like to do," says Jackson.

As director, Jackson hopes to make the music, dance and drama come together on stage and to capitalize on the feeling each cast member has for their character to make it work for the musical.

Jackson believes cabaret style theatre is the most popular now but he believes the Vic musical will continue to exist until there is no one around to watch it.

Vic Musicals have been produced every year since 1927, 1928.

The Varsity — Connie Filletti

street lamps, etc., etc., all invaded the Museum for the show. So much effort was being put into the theatrical portion of the event however, that there was no time or support for organizing the other activities. In the following year, the 'Revue' became the only attraction on the School Nite program.

During the fifties magnificent dance scenes and chorus lines outfitted in elaborate costumes were a major part of the production. In this era many of the people involved in Skule Nite came back year after year to take part: directors like Bob Zacharczuk, singers like the Skulehouse Four, and many other dedicated people.

In the late sixties however, attendance at Skule Nite was beginning to drop off, as it was for many campus activities at the time. The once-spirited college student was being replaced by a more serious breed which was not the least bit interested in the old 'rah rah' life that at one time had embraced the university. By 1966 the box office of Skule Nite was beginning to suffer. By 1968, it was becoming very hard for the Engineering Society to justify the thousands of dollars that were being poured into the show.

In an attempt to revive interest in the Engineering production, the Society in 1968 decided to put on the Broadway musical comedy "Stop the World, I Want to Get Off". As much work was put into this show as ever before, and it was probably the best theatrical performance in the history of Skule Nite. But it did not sell, and thousands of dollars were lost. To all those involved in the production that year it must have seemed that the days of Skule Nite were over. The next year the Executive of the Engineering Society, still suffering from the debt of the year before, would not support another Skule Nite.

Finally in the summer of 1972, it was decided that Skule Nite would be revived for the faculty's centennial year. There was much opposition, and most of it well founded on arguments of finances, lack of interest and no experience. In spite of this opposition, Scott Joliffe, Engineering Society President, made the decision "to bring back Skule Nite one last time." And the cast and crew delivered a Skule Nite that was an instant hit.

'Skule Nite 7T3 immediately begat Skule Nite 7T4 and with a whole year to put this epic together, it turned out even better than the first. And that brings us to the best news of all — it looks as if the Skule Nite tradition is back to stay."

HARD KNOCKS

Sponsored by the SAC's Women's Commission, Abby Hoffman, Canada's noted Olympic athlete, will speak on women's participation in contact sports on Tuesday, February 7th at 7 p.m. in the Medical Sciences Auditorium. Admission is free.

Billed by the Commission as Contact Sports: Can Women Win?, Ms. Hoffman is appearing as part of the Commission's winter programme.

Aside from being a winner of many track and field championships in Canada, Britain and the United States, Ms. Hoffman has also served as a consultant to the Olympic Association and is presently working with the Ontario Ministry of Culture and Recreation.

On January 9th, the Council for Athletics and Recreation at the U of T voted ten to five to prohibit women from competing with men in a number of "contact" intramural sports. This decision reverses one taken last fall which permitted two University College women to play intramural soccer.

Should contact sports at the U of T only be a man's game? Be at the Medical Sciences Auditorium on Tuesday, February 7th at 7 p.m. to take a side.

The SAC Women's Commission would also like to remind people to sign the Commission's petition against the new Student Aid Plan. Petitions are still available at all SAC locations.

SAC-GSU FORUM

It has been said that students face an uncertain prospect in regard to their futures. It has also been said that the students of today may be shivering in the cold in the not-too-distant-tomorrow.

Whatever your belief is, SAC and GSU have been working all year to give students a chance to take a closer look at unemployment from three major points of view: government policy, economics, and big business and labour.

Scheduled for today at 12 noon in the University College East Hall is the third forum of this series featuring Cliff Pilkey, President of the Ontario Federation of Labour, and Kenneth Cork, Vice-President and Treasurer of Noranda Mines, Incorporated. The forum will look at Labour and Business On Canada's Employment Crisis: Where Do Students Fit In?

Cliff Pilkey is a former M.P.P., a present member of the Board of Governors of Durham College, Brantford, Ontario, a former alderman and a past president of Local 222 of the United Automobile Workers' Union, the largest U.A.W. local in Canada. He was presented with the Centennial Medal of Canada in 1967.

Kenneth Cork holds top management positions in a number of major Canadian companies. He is one of the Directors of the Bank of Nova Scotia and a Director of E-L Financial Corporation Limited. A former Investment Counselor, he has a B.A. from the University of Toronto.

An open-floor discussion will follow the participant's presentations.

This year the SAC-GSU forums have previously featured Ed Broadbent, Mr. H.L. Robinson and Professors John Crispo, Mel Watkins and H.C. Eastman.

STUDENTS FACE UNCERTAIN PROSPECTS

EARTH BALL IS GOOD FUN

The First Annual Earth Ball Competition is scheduled for Saturday, February 11th at 1:00 p.m. at the field in Kings College Circle.

This mad-cap bit of organized lunacy is played much like hockey and is an invigorating experience for both mind and spirit. Sponsored by SAC and the Carling O'Keefe Breweries, Incorporated, Earth Ball is played by using a 12-foot-in-diameter ball made of the latest indestructible synthetic materials. The adventure is guaranteed to squash your inhibitions (to a pulp).

An eight-team limit is set for the competition, eight people (both men and women) per team, with five teammates from both sides on the field at one time. Game times will be set on the hour from 1 to 3 p.m. The semi-finals will begin at 3 and the championship game will get rolling at 4.

Be sure to register at the SAC office before February 11th.

The SAC Service Commission makes it a point that it is not inviting the Engineering LGMB Band to play at the February 11th Earth Ball Competition at the field in Kings College Circle. Absolutely not invited! EVERYONE ELSE, though, is invited.

TRI-CAMPUS PUB

The last big Rockathon before Reading Week is coming your way, as SAC gets it together for the giant, mind-shattering Tri-Campus Pub. The tight, raunchy sound of Offenbach will take over the Scarborough Meeting Place, Friday, February 3rd, starting at 8:00 p.m. and will play at the Erindale Blind Duck Pub on Saturday, February 4th. Pub doors open at Erindale at 7:00 p.m. Goddo will be appearing at Dr. John's on the St. George Campus on Friday, February 3rd. Beer will be available at Dr. John's, Erindale and Scarborough, as will plenty of dancing space.

Offenbach has, of course, played at some of the largest clubs in the city, last headlining the El Mocambo. Capable of playing French ballads, Offenbach is more widely known for its heavy rock and roll, and its blues. Its music is universal and features strong melodies; and, most importantly, it is just good fun.

So come on out to hear Offenbach - at Scarborough February 3rd and at Erindale February 4th. As well as Goddo at Dr. John's.

Lady Blues Storm The Capital

By KATHY CASEY

Toronto Women's Basketball team left early last Saturday for their long haul to Ottawa, after having the trip delayed a day as a result of the bad storm, to play Ottawa Gee Gees and the Carleton Robins.

The first game at Ottawa found the Ladies slightly tired from the trip. It didn't take long for the Blues to recover, however, and they dominated the first half of play. Ottawa was frustrated time and again by the tight Toronto defense and at the half the Blues were leading 27-26.

The second half of play, however, saw a complete reversal in the controlling team. Ottawa, currently in 2nd place in the league, took over the game as Toronto could not keep up the quick shots and hard rebounding they had displayed in the first half. The final score was Ottawa 63 and Toronto 47.

Outstanding players for Toronto were co-captain Janet Carson with 6 rebounds (top rebounder of the game), Barb Grochowski with 18 pts. and Joan Mlynarczyk, a rookie, who played one of her best games of the season.

The team adopted the famous "not to worry" of Janet Carson and came out mentally and physically ready for a win against Carleton on Sunday. Toronto, led by Barb Grochowski, was tough right from the start. Carleton managed to put up quite a few shots, unfortunately, and after the first 20 minutes led 25-24.

Toronto maintained their confidence and came back to the court as tough as at the onset of the game. But a few minutes into the 2nd half, Sandy Turney got into foul trouble and with Jane Leuty sitting out sick, the juggling began. Karen Zellen (keener), took on her share of the responsibility and hustled and rebounded as never before. All eyes focussed on Zellen and her ability to dominate the play as she led the team on to victory. The final score for Toronto was 51-44.

Barb Grochowski and Karen Zellen played probably their best games of the season. Grochowski was top scorer with 24 points and Zellen top rebounder as well as scoring 10 points.

This display of individual skill served to rally the Lady Blues and the whole team is to be congratulated on a fine game. Well done ladies!!!

Volleyball Steadily Advancing

By SANDY GRANT

Tomorrow evening in the upper Gym at the Benson Building, the Lady Blues Volleyball Team will play their last home game of the season against Laurier. The Blues have now advanced to the pre-finals to be played at Brock next weekend. This past weekend they competed in the Tier II Interlock at Ryerson.

Their first match last Friday was against Carleton. The Blues commanded the game from the opening moments through to their final game point, winning 2 games straight with scores of 15-7 and 15-6. It was due to the superior playing of team members such as Ellen Storey, who triggered some deadly spikes from the sets of Cathy Pogor and Kristi Varangu.

The Blues 2nd and final match of the evening was against Laurentian whose skills they underestimated. The Blues playing like a totally different team allowed Laurentian to take a lead of 14-8. Coach Julie Andrichiw, however, made it clear how the girls were to pull their act together — attack the ball! With this in mind, seasoned player Sandy Remegis served some tremendous "bullet" serves to the Laurentian squad. Before the Vees knew what had hit them, Toronto won the game 16-14.

The second game against Laurentian was U of T's as the Blues won the game 15-7. Rookie Jan Anderson always seemed to find the open spots on the Laurentian floor. Meanwhile, players Carol Cumby, Louise Scott, Mary Rafferty and Jane Evernden helped to lead the attack, that showed why the team is doing so well. After Friday's matches, Coach Andrichiw commented that, "the team was moving quite well and was playing aggressively."

On Saturday the Blues took on Trent in their easiest match, winning 2 games straight with scores of 15-4 and 15-5. The Blues played quite well with some exceptional hitting and serving by Marianne Ekberg.

The final match of the weekend was against Ryerson who played well, but bowed to Toronto 15-3. Rookie Julie Charles was often found up at the net blocking and placing some shots of her own. The team missed Rookie Dian Boonstra who is out with an injury. The final game against Ryerson was 15-7 for the Blues.

Coach Andrichiw was proud of her team's performance particularly the fact that they won every match in two games straight. Though the team has experienced defeats in their two last league games, Andrichiw is confident about Thursday's game against Laurier and she is looking forward to some stiff competition at the Pre-finals at Brock.

By ROS MATTHEWS

On Friday, the University of Toronto hosted its first Invitational Figure Skating Exhibition, with commendable results. The success of the Invitational was demonstrated by the smooth sequence of events, and the enjoyment of both skaters and the approximately 300 spectators who attended.

The majority of skaters were from Toronto, but member skaters from McMaster and Queen's also participated. Skaters presented exhibitions in both free skating and dance, from the novice through the senior level. The U. of T. members welcomed the opportunity to publicly perform their precision numbers for the first time this year. On the whole, the Invitational provided essential experience for the skaters.

Early morning practices continue as the team prepares for the Invitational competition at McMaster on Feb. 4, and the OWIAA Finals at Western on Feb. 18. Coach Jane Wilton, her assistant, Libby Pindar, and all the team members are working hard to win the championship for Toronto.

The Report On Unity

This past weekend found the U. of T. Synchronized swim team at Guelph University for the Central Ontario Sectional Competition. A winner of such a competition is declared on the basis of total points gained in the following categories: junior and senior compulsory figures, solo, duet and team routines. Each university is allowed two entries in each category, except in the team routine where only one entry is permitted.

In overall standings U. of T. placed second with 48 total points behind Guelph in first place with 56 points, and leaving Waterloo in third position.

Individual placings proved to be rather unusual, or unexpected, as the judging at the competition was somewhat inconsistent. But this is to be expected, since synchro swimming is subjectively judged.

In junior figures, Jan Marta and Janine Geddes placed 3rd and 4th respectively. A surprise in senior figures was the 2nd place finish of Janice Gourley, who was followed closely by teammates Lorraine Irvine 3rd and Andrea Pollock 4th.

The duet of Edite Marovskis and Janis Gourley earned a disappointing third place, ceding first and second place to Guelph. The second duet entry (Marilyn Hayashida and Cindy Nakatsu) did not even enter the water as both girls were plagued by the flu. A strong performance from this duet is anticipated in the finals at Queen's on February 11 and 12.

Soloists Andrea Pollock and Jan Marta swam well, placing 3rd and 4th. Their performances showed all those in attendance (not many!) what modern synchro swimming is all about — Andrea swimming to jazz and Jan to the musical sounds of seagulls and wind and waves on the seashore.

The final event — the team routine — was the highlight of the day. The team's performance was their best to date, with flawless formations and perfect synchronization throughout. Debbie Batrum, Patty Copeland, Janine Geddes, Marilyn Hayashida, Chris Kalin, Sue Maltby, Edite Marovskis, Cindy Nakatsu and Lorraine Irvine (alternate) formed this 8-man team.

BEGIN IS DOING HIS PART — YOU DO YOURS

A negotiated peace plan will not bring an end to the poverty and social problems of the Middle East. Every year since her existence, Israel has paid dearly for some of the basic rights we take for granted. The fact is, the little bit you're holding back can mean the difference between life and death. If you think we're being a little melodramatic . . . ask the Soviet Jewish immigrants who need to be absorbed and retrained in their new environment. . . . ask the family of twelve living in a one-room apartment.

Now ask what you can do for them.

When a UJA canvasser calls to solicit you, make a moral decision. Your money will help Jews everywhere maintain Jewish social service agencies and Jewish schools.

Side Line By-Line

By JIM O'LEARY

After years of debate it appears that the Department of Athletics will probably announce that the university is going to become actively involved in the training and promotion of international calibre athletes.

This development should come as no surprise. In 1973, Governing Council committed the U of T to this by recommending that a program be developed "to provide opportunity for athletes in a few carefully-selected sports to pursue world standards of performance."

This reflects a global trend which has seen many sports turn to international competition for both high level competition and revenue.

Sport at the university level is no exception. One need only look at two recent examples for proof of this.

On January 8, Team Canada played many of the best American football players in the first annual Can-Am Bowl. Also over the Christmas holidays, a Student National hockey team competed in Europe to gain international exposure which is hoped will be useful when Canada ices its team for the 1980 Olympics.

In her Green Paper on national sport, Iona Campagnolo expresses the belief that universities contain all the necessary resources to produce high calibre athletes. They have such things as coaches, facilities, athletes, dormitories, food services, doctors and sport scientists. She proposes that these resources be put to use to produce "excellence" in the field of athletics.

The federal government seems ready and the U of T seems willing to launch a program to develop excellent athletes. It is now time to stop the talking and get down to concrete planning.

The U of T should act quickly on this matter. If they can get organized there is no reason why the U of T could not become the centre of Canada's international sport program.

The U of T has a better supply of the resources Campagnolo speaks of than most universities in this country. Toronto is also this country's media centre which is important in the eyes of the government.

The benefits U of T would receive are fairly obvious.

Exceptional athletes will be drawn to the U of T giving this institution increased exposure across the nation and possibly around the world. Increased exposure leads to money. Money from the government, private sponsors, and bigger crowds at sporting events on campus.

While most of this money will be earmarked for development of international athletics, there can be little doubt that it will benefit the university as a whole. When Varsity Stadium was used for Olympic soccer games in 1976, the stands got a badly needed face lift courtesy of the federal government. Money spent on campus facilities is to the benefit of all students.

An international program at the U of T would also attract the country's best coaches. There is no reason to doubt that the influence of expert coaching will rub off on our intercollegiate athletes. Intercollegiate athletes are bound to pick up training techniques they see being employed by international stars.

It is inevitable that the U of T will become involved in international athletics. While there are many who feel that this project is ill timed they should recognize that what is happening at this campus is only a reflection of what is taking place all over the world. International athletics are becoming big business.

In light of the many economic problems of the Athletic Department, it appears they cannot afford to let this opportunity pass by.

Poor Shooting Proves Costly

By TIM O'LEARY

A poor performance at the foul line cost the Basketball Blues a chance to wrap up a playoff spot in Ottawa last weekend. They lost games to the Universities of Ottawa and Carleton because they couldn't capitalize on their free throws.

Ottawa, Carleton and Toronto are fighting it out for two playoff spots. York and Laurentian are assured of finishing one-two.

Toronto went to Ottawa boasting an impressive three win-one loss record which had them in third place. A win over Ottawa, which had only one win in five outings, would have all but assured Toronto of its first playoff spot in years.

The Blues played well in Ottawa but lost 87-82. The difference was on the foul line: Toronto scored only 10 points while Ottawa dropped in 23.

Despite the loss, the Blues could have maintained the upper hand in the playoff race if they had lost by less than five points. In the event of a tie in the standings, the deciding factor would be the point differential in the two games played between these teams. In their first meeting, the Blues won by five points, which meant a loss by no more than four points was essential.

Randy Cook played his usual strong game against Ottawa, picking up 17 points and hauling in 14 rebounds. Other high scorers for Toronto were Doug Fox with 19, Tim McGhie with 16 and Frank Wenzl with 13 points.

Carleton played a strong game to beat the Blues 86-79 on Sunday. Once again the Blues' inability to hit from the foul line was instrumental — they hit on only 53 per cent of their free throws.

Carleton shot a respectable 41 per cent from the floor compared to a disappointing 31 per cent for the Blues.

Once again the Blues were led by Cook with his second consecutive 17 point, 14 rebound night. Tim McGhie and Joe Braunstein each picked up 10 points.

In order to make the playoffs the Blues will have to win big over the weaker teams in the league. In the event of a tie with Ottawa it will be broken by looking at the point differential of the two teams over the season.

This Friday provides the Blues with an excellent opportunity to win big. They meet the Queen's Golden Gaels who have won only once this season over the winless Ryerson Rams. Game time is 8:15 in the Benson Building.

Insufficient Funds Pin Wrestlers

By HUGH STUART

Most Varsity coaches at this university have been frustrated by the lack of funds made available to their teams. Few have more reason to sing the blues than wrestling coach Joe Rabel.

During the last six years the U of T wrestling program has developed into a strong one. However, for a variety of reasons the sport is in danger of dying at its roots.

At the high school level, wrestling is booming. Unfortunately, according to Rabel, it is unlikely that many high school graduates will wrestle at U of T.

The reasons for this are two fold. In the first place, facilities are poor. The wrestling room is already too crowded to conduct an effective practice. Plans to accommodate the wrestlers in the new athletic building are highly tentative. Not only are practise facilities poor, but U of T is also ill equipped to host competitions. No funds have been made available to purchase the competitive mat that is essential.

The second factor is that wrestling is not considered to be one of the glamor sports. Assistant coach Rob Moore put it best: "It's the end of January and the university papers are still writing about football."

If a team's success is the criteria for allocating sports funds, then the wrestling team should have no financial woes. The U of T Wrestling Club has improved from a fifth place position in the OUAA five years ago to a challenger for second place.

In the heavy weight category things are taken care of in the form of Junior Pan American Games gold and silver medalist Erik Boss. Rabel says he's a strong technician. Boss is also a defensive lineman for the football Blues.

Good coaching has produced an improvement in U of T's wrestling program despite a lack of funds.

Another Varsity footballer, John Brown, was third in the OUAA championships last year and is expected to match or improve his placing this season.

At 167 or 177 pounds there are Jack Preobrazenski and Ed Rector. Both are good technicians and both finished strong at Queen's this season.

Second year Engineering student Glen Worhegyin is the man to watch at 158 pounds while at 150 great things are expected of George Mutamaki. This graduate student was second in Ontario last season and third in Canada. Also at 150 is Angelo Callegari who has shown great potential and could finish in the top three.

At Tamane and Gord Cheung are the two rookies who have a good chance to pick up some points for the team in the OUAA's. Tamane has done exceptionally well this season at 118 pounds. He was first at Queen's and third at Guelph. Cheung is a natural athlete and Rabel expects him to surprise some people.

One of the Blues' most outstanding wrestlers is fourth year Phys Ed student Sam Turchiano. He was third in the CIAU Championships last season and in spite of the fact that he is moving up a weight category should do very well this year.

Sophomore Frank Buffone has made the difficult drop from 118 pounds to 109. If he can drop the weight he'll be tough to beat.

It is at the 220 pound class that Rabel is concerned. He is still looking for a competitor in this class.

Although there is a strong nucleus for Rabel and assistants Moore and Clive Liewelyn to work with, the team cannot close the gap on Western and Guelph without greater depth. The wrestling program is open to any student Rabel is looking for more participants. They are needed to practice with the team's better wrestlers who tend to become lax in practice without good opponents, and they are needed to pick up points in competition.

So far students are not flocking to the wrestling room eager to join the program. Money is one remedy for this situation. Improved facilities would attract more participants. These participants would provide the essential ingredient of competitive depth. And with the success that would result from this depth, and with the ability to hold tournaments at home, would come greater recognition, and acceptance of the sport. Oversimplified? Yes. A possibility? Hopefully.

Yeomen Climbing To The Top

The latest national Basketball rankings are bad news for the Blues. They show that the York Yeomen are continuing their climb towards the number one spot. This week they moved from third to second spot.

This is bad news for the Blues because Toronto has a home and away mini-series with the Yeomen next week. They play at the Benson Building on February 7 and go to York for a rematch on the 10th.

The Yeomen are led by Princeton University transfer student Lonnie Ramati. At 6'9" he towers over most opponents.

The Yeomen have so much depth that last year's O.U.A.A. all-star Chris McNeill, has spent most of this season on the bench.

Kelly confirmed to review program

By PHILIP LIBMAN

Arts and Science Dean Arthur Kruger has appointed a committee headed by St. Michael's College president father John Kelly, to review the faculty's New Program, sources revealed yesterday to the Varsity.

Kelly has gone on record as an opponent of the New Program, saying that "the colleges have been ravaged" by it. (The New Program is the present system of course selection leading to an undergraduate degree in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Erindale College recently replaced it with a more stringent "New New Program.")

"The colleges have lost meaning for students since the inception of the New Program," Kelly said in a telephone interview yesterday. "Colleges have no planning function." We can't build up our academic resources."

The committee will comprise three students and an unascertained number of faculty — Kruger said he couldn't "recall exactly" the number. The selection of a committee head with such a strong bias against the New Program prompted student council president John Tuzyk to comment:

"I hope that they will seriously consider all comments from students since it is the students who are most affected by the program. Father Kelly, when he was chairman of the Transitional Year Program report, showed that he's basically a fair-minded, hard-working energetic sort."

"SAC hopes that there will be open hearings on the matter," continued Tuzyk. "A curriculum shouldn't coerce students to take courses at the colleges. The courses must be made attractive and intellectually stimulating enough that there will be a positive reason for taking college courses. The review is also interesting to note in the light of what is happening at Innis." (Innis

Evans withholds budget

By DAVID ZELDIN

A growing struggle over funding between the Political Economy Course Union (PECU) and the university administration has led to U of T president John Evans' refusal to release budget details to PECU.

While enrolment has risen significantly in the Political Economy department, it still faces the prospect of cutbacks in the next academic year and PECU is concerned about the effects of such cutbacks on student education.

Citing the department's quest for rooms to seat 400 students and the large increases this year in the enrolment of many courses (ECO 100 has a 30 per cent increase this year in enrolment), PECU chairman Harvey Cooper stated that the funding arrangements should be open.

PECU executive member Paul Calarco, last week sent a letter to Evans asking for disclosure of precise figures in the political economy department for everything from professors' salaries to travel, entertainment, furnishings and discretionary funds, since department chairman Ian Drummond and Arts and Science dean Arthur Kruger had earlier refused to reveal any figures. It was the second letter from Calarco. Evans said in reply to the first that his request was too general, Calarco stated.

Evans wrote back Monday in response to the clarified request that university policy "does not require each department to disclose the details of the departmental budget" and "since your request does not relate to a specific policy but rather to the detailed information in all categories of departmental budget, I have no reason for suggesting a change in the established procedure."

Calarco maintains, however, that if PECU could get the budget it could act in a more knowledgeable manner.

"We're not out to find out how much each professor is getting but we just want to find out how the money is spent," he said.

Calarco stated that Kruger could not cite any official rules or regulations to justify withholding information. He simply said it was long standing policy to do so.

But Calarco says, "I will not accept any 'long standing policy' as an excuse to withhold information."

Calarco continued, "Evans is content with present policy and his contentment hurts students' interests."

Evans was out of town and unavailable for comment. Acting president Donald Chant said that "our general policy is to release general information and it's up to individual departments to release more detailed information."

Kruger refused to comment until he has seen Evans' letter and discussed the matter with Drummond.

What can gov't do?

By SHANE PARKHILL

The role of government in solving the unemployment crisis was the main point of contention in Wednesday's debate between representatives of business and labor at University College. Cliff Pilkey, President of the Ontario Federation of Labour, and Kenneth Cork, Vice-President and Treasurer of Noranda Mines, were the main speakers at the third forum in the Students' Administrative Council-Graduate Students' Union Employment Series.

Cork, a director of the Bank of Nova Scotia and of E-L Financial Corporation, denied that he spoke on behalf of business, saying "I speak for all of you as people — without labels." He admitted that the job prospects for students graduating in the near future are not good, but said that it does not matter how closely related a job is to one's post-secondary education as long as it allows the individual to develop skills that are "broadly applicable." He added that the "best skill is reason, which has wide application." He urged job-seekers to be flexible with their education and willing to start at the bottom and to travel. "Society is just people," he said; "people don't owe you anything." He also criticized the amount of public financing of university education, saying

"impersonal funding buys impersonal education."

Cork said that unemployment stems from an "entrepreneurial climate" that is the "worst in memory." He complained that capital costs are rising faster than consumer prices. Describing the entrepreneur as that "poor, abused poltroon," he added: "We don't have to like them, but at least we should respect them." Cork listed high taxes, construction costs, utility rates, and "mushrooming" governmental regulations as some of the factors restricting investment.

Pilkey, a former MPP and past president of United Automobile Workers Local 222, felt the job situation was much worse than Cork had described it. Graduates "don't have a guarantee of a job — period," he said, adding that "there are people with PhD's driving taxi cabs in Toronto." He criticized Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau for saying that Canadians are not willing to do physical labor, saying that it is "not the menial jobs they disagree with but the menial pay that goes with those jobs." He described government cutbacks which threw workers "onto the scrap heap of unemployment" as "inexcusable" and "indefensible," and stated that "anyone who is willing to work should be given a job."

Admin says 'NON'

By RICHARD SMALL

The university administration has delivered an emphatic "non" to the Task Force on Canadian Studies' controversial recommendation that French become an entrance requirement for the Faculty of Arts and Science by 1982. Its report on the issue, prepared by Vice-President and Provost Donald Chant, was released to the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council last night.

The report began by acknowledging that the status of French on campus was an important matter "related to the choice of a future role for this university."

"We can be either a relatively parochial leader in English-speaking Canada, or the kind of national leader we have sometimes claimed to be, but which we will not be unless we earn it. If the University of Toronto has ambitions to be an important national university, it must accept national responsibilities and respond to national needs," the report said.

However, it noted several obstacles to the approval of the Task

Force's recommendation: the negative reaction of Ontario secondary schools, the likelihood that no other university would follow U of T's example, and the adverse reactions of the university's teaching departments. "It seems unlikely, therefore, that the university would serve its constituencies most effectively by imposing a compulsory requirement of facility in French... either as an entrance or exit requirement," the report concluded.

The administration recommended, however, that access to existing French instruction be facilitated and that students be encouraged to recognize that "a knowledge of the (French) language will prove to be increasingly important for the handling of research materials... and for understanding certain subjects in their full context."

The report will be taken into consideration by the Academic Affairs Committee which after prolonged debate will soon be making its own recommendations on the issue to the Governing Council.

Other students angrier, says OFS

By CELIA RASBACH

Students at northern Ontario universities have reacted with greater apprehension than U of T students to proposed OSAP revisions, according to Miriam Edelson, chairperson of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

Edelson, speaking Wednesday at an OFS press conference, had just returned from a tour of northern Ontario universities gathering input for a brief that the OFS will submit to the Ontario Cabinet. Her remarks about U of T's apathy were substantiated by the poor turnout at the conference held in the student council (SAC) office.

"I found the students to be angry, puzzled and frustrated, mainly because they don't know precisely what changes Parrott is planning to make," she told an audience of four. "Many students are concerned about next year's loan plan because they know they won't be getting jobs this summer."

OFS plans to submit a brief to the Ontario cabinet next Tuesday outlining its position on student aid. Edelson commented that "perhaps this attempt to influence the Cabinet will result in frustration, but I think it's important to make the attempt anyway."

Edelson pointed out that students have already won some victories in the OSAP battle. Next year, students' summer earnings will be taken into consideration when they apply for student aid. She also said that the loan plan will have a regional clause that makes allowances for different costs of living in different areas of the province by the 1979-80 academic year.

However, OFS is opposed to some key revisions in the plan concerning eligibility periods of the loans, and the change in the definition of an independent student. John Shortall, OFS field worker, estimated that this last revision will cut 2,000 students off student aid.

The brief also deals with cutbacks, student unemployment, access to post-secondary education, possible methods of raising revenue for universities, and the age of majority. OFS will meet with the Ontario Cabinet next Thursday to discuss the brief.

Duplication wastes money

By PETER HOHENADEL

U of T Press plant manager Harold Eng said that the duplicating equipment maintained by many colleges and departments on the St. George campus has led to an "extremely wasteful" situation in duplicating costs at the university.

"There's a lot of room for cutting cost in duplication at U of T," said Eng, who works at the Downsview office of U of T Press. He estimated that the university could save 35 to 40 percent on the cost of paper by buying in larger quantities for centralized printing.

Harald Bohne, director of U of T Press, added that the operating costs for this equipment is not always considered in assessing the cost of duplicating equipment. A recent Varsity survey revealed at least 11 full-time and 1 part-time employees operating duplicating equipment at various colleges and departments at U of T.

Bohne pointed out that U of T Press maintains a duplicating service in the basement of Sid Smith. The Duplicating Service has recently purchased an offset press capable of printing both sides of a sheet simultaneously, as well as an AB Dick Collator. The new equipment, valued at $60,000, enables the U of T Press Duplicating Service to cut its printing time by one half.

Despite the new equipment the Duplicating Service is severely hampered by space restrictions. A staff of eight, together with equipment, storage, and office space, are cramped into 620 square feet of working space. U of T Press's Duplicating Service offers 24-hour printing and free pickup and delivery. Comparative prices of 10 downtown job printers revealed very competitive rates for U of T Press.

Ken Allen, printing co-ordinator at U of T Press's Downsview plant, is researching duplication services at the downtown campus. Allen also considers the decentralization of duplicating services to be very wasteful. "As long as the departments are going on their own, there will be no significant reduction in cost," Allen said. "Certainly, we wouldn't need the proliferation of equipment that we've come to."

Harald Bohne said that if duplication was consolidated under U of T Press, the financial burden to the university would be considerably lessened. Bohne explained that duplication could be absorbed into the independent financial structure of the Press. Assuming a base salary of $7,430 (Salary Group I) for Copy Machine operators, the present labour cost to the university is at least $80,000. This figure is even higher when higher rates of pay for offset press operators are considered.

Jack Sword, special assistant to the President and Chairman of the U of T Press Board, explained that the proliferation of duplicating equipment is probably a result of U of T's policy of decentralization and autonomy for various colleges and departments. He said that a strong case for centralization of Duplicating services at U of T could be brought before the Budget Committee.

Concepts of Middle East peace discussed

By CHARLES MEISTER
and PHILIP LIBMAN

"The core of the Middle East conflict has been the unwillingness of the Arab states to accept the legitimacy of a Jewish state in the Middle East," said Irwin Cotler, Professor of Law at McGill University at a symposium Wednesday on the Arab-Jewish conflict.

Another panel member, Gabriel Warburg, visiting professor of History from Haifa University, agreed: "Total peace will never happen without solving the Palestinian problem."

Cotler, referring to the turmoil of recent events, cited many firsts in that area. He also related his recent experiences with Egyptian, Jordanian and Syrian officials, in explaining the Arab "concept of peace", which he clearly differentiated from their "honest desire for peace".

Cotler, who was in Egypt soon after the recent election surprise victory of Menachem Begin's Likud government, related that an Egyptian minister told him: "The election of Begin and his party is advantageous to Egypt, Cotler explained, "Since they felt that the image of the Likud government would be reactionary, headed by a terrorist, in contrast to the moderate position of Sadat. The key to winning the conflict by winning American public opinion would be these contrasting positions."

"But when this did not materialize," Cotler continued, "as Begin did very well in his summer trip to Washington, Sadat went to Israel, partly in the hope of exposing Begin for what they believed him to be," Cotler related.

"By neutralizing American public opinion, this would neutralize US government support, and perhaps split the all-important bloc of American Jewry. And if American Jewry would not split, they would find themselves isolated from the rest of the public, which would then minimize their influence," Cotler said of the Egyptian strategy.

Referring to the present on-again, off-again negotiations, Cotler emphasized that Egypt firmly believes that "Israeli withdrawal from all lands captured in the June '67 war and Palestinians' rights to self-determination are pre-conditions for negotiation, while the Israelis see these as negotiable issues."

"The Egyptians see themselves as representing all Arabs, and no agreement can prejudice the positions of the Palestinians. When they mentioned the condition of Palestinian compensation, they included it only because President Carter said it first," said Cotler.

Referring to the much-hoped for final peace, Cotler said, "The problem with the present position of the Arabs is not 1967, but 1947, because before 1967 there were no 'occupied territories' and the Palestinians could have had a homeland on the West Bank. But we are dealing here with deep belief systems. The Arabs believe Judaism to be solely a religion, and the Jews therefore not to be a people and with no right to self-determination. The creation of Israel is viewed as the original sin. But they are not anti-Semitic — it is their understanding of Judaism that leads to these conclusions."

Staff meet

Come and chew the fat at a Varsity staff meeting scheduled for 1 pm today in the corridors of power in the Varsity building. Topics on the agenda will include: Varsity finances (What will we do with the extra $3,000?), CUP, ORCUP, a critical look at the week's papers, RCMP and military ads, and other business. New blood is welcome. Come find out what it's all about.

ELECTION

• FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

Students: Seats available - 2 in each of Victoria, Trinity, New, Erindale Colleges
Seats available - 1 in each of University, Woodsworth Colleges

Faculty:

Departmental

Humanities Seats available - 1 in each of EAS, ENG, FRE, GER, HIS, ITA, LIN, NES, REL, SIS
Life Sciences Seats available - 1 in BOT
Physical Sciences Seats available - 1 in each of AST, CHM, GLG
Social Sciences Seats available - 1 in ANT
Erindale Seats available - 3

Divisional

Humanities Seats available - 1
Life Sciences Seats available - 3
Physical Sciences Seats available - 2
Social Sciences Seats available - 4

• STUDENTS

- COMMITTEE ON STUDY ELSEWHERE
- COUNSELLING COMMITTEE

Curriculum Committees

Students:

College Courses and Programmes Seats available - 2 (including 1 part-time student)
Humanities Seats available - 3 (full-time students)
Life Sciences Seats available - 2 (including 1 part-time)
Physical Sciences Seats available - 4 (including 1 part-time)
Social Sciences Seats available - 1 (full-time student)

Faculty:

College Courses and Programmes Seats available - 5
Humanities Seats available - 4
Life Sciences Seats available - 3
Physical Sciences Seats available - 4
Social Sciences Seats available - 3

Committee On Counselling

Students Seats available - 1 in each of University, Trinity, New, Erindale and Woodsworth Colleges

Committee On Study Elsewhere

Students Seats available - 1

NOMINATIONS

Nomination forms can also be obtained through Departmental, Registrars, APUS and ASSU offices or from the Faculty Office. Completed nomination forms must be received in the Faculty Office, Room 1006, Sidney Smith Hall, prior to 4:00 p.m. on February 10th, 1978 to be valid.

Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 978-3389 or 978-3392. A complete description of the Committees of the Faculty Council is to be found in the 1977-78 calendar of the Faculty pages 10-11 and 336-338.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1960 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

ENEMY WITHIN

Today a committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science may well decide to axe Innis College's Independent Studies program. The history of this cutback is particularly interesting because it reveals the blatant hypocrisy of so-called "student leaders" like Dave Reinboth, president of the Innis College Student Society (ICSS).

Last year the Ontario government and the administration of our university decided to cut spending by a minimum of three per cent across the board. At Innis this meant the loss of $28,000. When the question of this cutback was put before the academic affairs committee of the Innis College council, on which Reinboth sits, he and other student bureaucrats, in complicity with faculty and staff members, drafted a recommendation which, in effect, sanctioned government cutbacks. Instead of setting out to fight cutbacks themselves the student "leaders" decided which courses to cut first.

When the recommendation went before the Innis College council Reinboth again gave his support to cutbacks by voting to ratify the report of the academic affairs committee.

Attention was focussed on Innis's Independent Studies program. All the courses in this program had already been slated to be cut by Reinboth and the others due to lack of money. Cutting these courses would mean the loss of five resource people, fewer students in a pared-down program and, of course, less cost. To rationalize this cutback the principal of Innis, William Saywell, and the members of the Faculty committee reviewing the program began questioning the "academic excellence" of the courses. The program has been reviewed by the Faculty of Arts and Science every year for a decade and only now, when the Ontario government is cutting funds to education, do they decide to question its academic excellence.

To try to cover themselves, Reinboth and the members of ICSS, after agreeing which courses to cut, asked that Independent Studies be kept roughly in its present form. Led by Reinboth, the college council made the same request, once again after agreeing with courses to cut.

Saywell reacted to this weak-kneed gesture by stating publicly his belief that the courses should go for reasons, lo and behold, of "academic excellence."

We wonder why he bothered. At a January 27th meeting of the Innis council Reinboth again exposed his own hypocrisy by supporting a motion sanctioning the principal's right (as if Saywell needed the council's sanction) to disagree publicly with council, except on matters "central to college policy."

But Reinboth and the other student "leaders" made no attempt, at that time, or since, to determine which matters are, in fact, central to policy. Not that it matters much; Saywell has stated that he will, in effect, do as he damn well pleases, and to hell with council. The clause concerning policy was clearly inserted to sugar the pill Reinboth and the others swallowed.

The matter does not rest there. At last Monday's meeting of the Faculty committee reviewing the Independent Studies program, Reinboth and the treasurer of ICSS arrived late begged the committee's indulgence and then asked on so respectfully that the matter be left up to the college council.

If the committee on college courses and its chairman, the dean of Arts and Science, Arthur Kruger, are smart, that's exactly what they'll do. Why not? Reinboth is their boy. He'll give them just what they want, make a few hypocritical statements to save face and everybody will be happy — everybody, that is, except the students who might like to take part in the Innis program next year.

It has become increasingly evident that the students who control our councils at this university — sell-outs like Reinboth — are more interested in their careers, in not rocking the administration's boat, than in fighting to protect and promote students' interests on this campus.

If students are going to fight government cutbacks, administration and student council complicity, they are going to have to organize themselves outside the moribund spiritless structures the administration, and student bureaucrats, have erected to protect their interests, the interests of good girls and boys looking for a career in business or the civil service.

English testing

One can only marvel at your inability to grasp the fundamentals of an issue. I refer of course to your editorial (Jan. 25th) on English proficiency tests. There are several points in this editorial with which I would like to take issue.

You accuse Professor Northey and Dean Morton of logical inconsistencies, and yet you yourselves are guilty of the same misdeemeanor. Consider the following statement: "If English is the language that students have to use in high school and at university then presumably a person who makes it to university and is able to survive here is proficient in English". This barren argument contains at least one flaw: it assumes that we live in the best of all possible worlds and should not attempt to rise above the minimum standards necessary for getting along in this world. Moreover, it fails to take into account the flexibility of standards and the central question for the university: whether professors can continue to accept a situation where jargon masquerades as English language and where clarity of thinking is foregone for the proliferation of amorphous formulations which, ultimately, say nothing.

Secondly, you assert that this notion of an English proficiency test is "a clean way to cut down the number of students at university" and you insist that "this explanation is far more consistent with current government educational policy than the official rationale". In effect, you wallow in your own contradictions, for this presumes that such a test is being sought at the initiative of the government, while we know that it is the university that wishes to see such tests applied. Nor, one must note, is it in the interests of either the government or the university to "cut down the number of students at university": from the governmental point of view, students in university are just one more group off the unemployment rolls; from the universities' point of view, more students means larger government grants, which are calculated on a per-capita basis. Why, then, should the government wish to increase unemployment by reducing the student population at universities, and why should the universities wish to lose their main source of revenue?

It might just be — thought I realize how it would pain you to admit it — that the academics actually are worried about how standards of English expression and English comprehension have been lowered in the past two decades to take into account the declining proficiency in the language of students entering university. In a thoroughly characteristic display of hyperbole you have chosen to refer to this worthy concern — and the solution proposed — as "Northey's inquisition". This is unfair in the extreme, and, furthermore, fails to address itself to the question at hand. Had you an iota of imagination you would have seized on the more essential point — that an English proficiency test can only be a band-aid solution for the preservation of university-level English in the television age — rather than treating this complex issue as yet another opportunity to launch one of your pedestrian broadsides at the Davis Government.

Innis complains

The Innis College Student Society (ICSS) was upset by Mr. George M. Cook's misinterpretation of the events which took place at the sub-committee meeting of the Courses and Programmes Committee on Monday, January 30, 1978. We believe our response shall rectify the situation and clarify ambiguities and misinformation.

The ICSS was impressed by George Cook's fashion article on the front page of Wednesday's Varsity (February 1, 1978). It's a pity he didn't provide commentary on the stylish apparel worn by the Committee members. We fail to see how students' tastes in clothing could have any possible bearing on the issues in question.

David Reinboth, President of the ICSS, Gord Edwards, Vice-President of the ICSS, and Mark Weisdorf, Treasurer of the ICSS (identified in the article as Vice-President) met with Dean Kruger on the morning of January 30, 1978. At the meeting, we clearly identified ourselves as the Executive Officers of the ICSS. Furthermore, we presented the Dean with a Brief put together by the Innis College Student Society which was received by the Innis College Council on January 27, 1978. This Brief, among other things, clearly outlines the Student Society position of the Community Living Programme and the Independent Studies sequence of courses housed at Innis College.

David Reinboth and Mark Weisdorf were present at the sub-committee meeting of the Courses and Programmes Committee. Although we attended as students and observers, we signed in under our official titles. The only reason that we elected to speak out towards the end of the meeting was that we wished Committee members to voice their feelings on certain issues which were of interest to students and had not been addressed at the meeting.

Cook's article also mentions a Report from the Innis College Academic Affairs Committee that was ratified by the Innis College Council on December 6, 1977. The article is wrong to say that this Report calls for "16 courses including all those in Independent Studies" to be cut in the event of loss of funds. The facts are as follows: only four courses (two full and two half) may be discontinued.

It was recommended that two other courses be reduced from three to two sections. The Report did not recommend that any Independent Studies courses be discontinued. It did, however, suggest that the number of Resource people be cut back from five to three. If the loss in revenue does not amount to $28,000, then some of these proposals will not be acted upon.

We would be happy to verify or provide correct information to any Varsity reporter writing an article concerning Innis College. We, unfortunately assumed that Cook would check his facts as a matter of course.

Classical education

Some U of T professors continue to harp on the values of traditional university education with surprisingly shallow analyses. (See, for example, J. Polanyi. Letters to the Editor, The Globe and Mail). U of T liaison officers sell the notion that universities function primarily to develop the critical and creative capacities of their students. President-elect James Ham informs the public that universities are not about vocation.

All this profound honesty is little more than half truth. Many U of T departments (excluding Law, Medicine and Engineering) conveniently ignore the fact that their institutions function additionally as the wombs of most professional classes. This ignorance is reminiscent of irresponsible parents who claim unquestionable rights to produce as many children as they physically can. James Ham well knows that U of T is funded in approximate accordance with the size of its student population (to heck with graduate discontent).

High school students have begun to realize that universities are not guaranteed conveyor belts that will transport them to the stars. This premature birth of critical and creative capacity among intelligent young people should not be mistaken for cynicism. It is eminently practical. If U of T wants to continue to attract excellence then it will have to revise the structures of its general degree programs to match the changing face of Canada's professional needs.

Reactionary purists may rest assured that implementing such changes need not dilute traditional studies nor sacrifice academic impeccability. It is difficult to assess, however, whether that sort of revision can be achieved with views such as Ham's at the helm.

U of T bureaucracy

Regarding the letter by Paul Szeto in Varsity on Jan. 30, 1978, I have the same feeling he has. I find this whole university overshadowed by a bureaucratic atmosphere which is causing a lot of inefficiency and degradation of the university in many aspects. This university is

College is currently considering cutting programs for reasons including funding.)

Kruger in a telephone interview agreed with Kelly that "the colleges have been ravaged by the New Program. Enrolment to the colleges has fallen since the New Program. Father Kelly's position is not controversial.

When asked about a possible conflict between the Faculty of Arts and Science and the colleges, Kelly answered, "We must discuss what a college is for. We have the double problem of the faculty and the colleges, and it is traditional at U of T that colleges play a significant part in the life of the student. Now they play a smaller part. Colleges are a necessary thing.

"I feel that the New Program hasn't served the students well," emphasized Kelly. "The alienation and the unfamiliarity with professors is part of the New Program."

Phil Ryan, Arts and Science undergraduate representative on Governing Council, expressed reservations about the appointment. "I feel that it might have been wiser to choose a more objective chairman. I am worried that the review will concentrate on the administrative and financial problems caused by the New Program and ignore the academic side of the question."

subsidized by the Ontario Government, therefore the irresponsible university staffs are also wasting the taxpayers' money. In fact, bureaucratism should be recognized as the major cause of the social and economic problems that Canada has today.

In recalling the incident of the medical student, Henry Fong, this university also seems to lack justice. Finally I would suggest Mr. Szeto appeal to the Ombudsman Office because these cases of injustice must not be allowed to exist in this reputable university.

Greek witchunt

The resurgence of international anarchism in recent years has been nothing less than phenomenal. In Spain, the spiritual homeland of anarchism, the renaissance C.N.T. claims over 125,000 members up from the 26,000 of a few months ago. In France, Italy, Britain and throughout the world anarchists are again posing their potent criticisms of State and society. Once again both communist and capitalist tremble at the spectre of anarchism. But with fear comes reaction, often blind and senseless reaction as has happened in Greece.

At this moment thirty Greek anarchists are languishing in prison charged with the "moral authorship" of crimes to which they cannot be linked by direct evidence. The imprisonment of these thirty anarchists is part of the Greek State's ruthless campaign against the young Greek anarchist movement which has the openly avowed aim of completely exterminating anarchism in Greece.

The immediate cause of the arrests were the anarchist demonstrations of October 18-19 protesting the assassinations of Baader, Enslin and Raspe. The Greek police smashed these demonstrations and arrested many of the participants. The Greek press shamelessly presented those arrested as "terrorists" attempting to create a climate of opinion that would permit heavy sentences. Further demonstrations and armed attacks on German consulates and business interests by persons unknown sparked an even heavier crackdown. All editors of anarchist and libertarian newspapers and periodicals were arrested as "moral authors (perpetrators)" of all the violent crimes committed during this period. They were arrested on the basis of a law of 1944 as modified by the military junta of 1971, which had not been used until now but had served as the model for the West German law on "sympathizers". This law gives the State the basis upon which to arrest and send to trial persons without actual charge, but merely for what it deems to be grounds for suspecting one of being a sympathizer. From now on anyone can be sent to prison without a factual charge.

At the trial of the "moral authors" the State found it difficult to accuse them of any specific act. The judges were full of searching questions "Would you participate...?" "Would you agree to...?" "Could you give us the name of...?" The first trial disintegrated and the anarchists were sent back to jail to await re-trial. Under this procedure they could be confined indefinitely.

The government of Constantine Karamalis is using the anarchists as a political whipping boy to rally Greek voters to his side. The "Red Scare" is an old politician's trick to panic public opinion that has been used time and time again. Will it work? In the meantime libertarian ideas have been outlawed in Greece.

It cannot be stressed enough that the anarchists in Greece are accused of no specific crime. The State proclaims with warped logic that as advocates of anarchism they are morally and legally responsible for any anarchistic acts within Greece. The bourgeoisie press has totally ignored the persecution of anarchists in Greece. Only the concerted protests of all persons concerned with civil liberties will save the thirty anarchists from unjust imprisonment. Letters of protest should be sent to Evagelos Yiannopoulos, President of the Lawyers Association of Athens, Panepistimou 34, Athens, Greece. An up-to-the-minute report on the situation in Greece will be given at a conference on the International Anarchist Movement to be held at Trinity College on February 23.

Civic reformers want transit better planned

By ROBERTA CLARE

In an effort to cut escalating capital expenditures the Toronto Transit Commission (TTC) is blindly decreasing bus route services, Reform Metro charges. The committee of Toronto citizens, which aims "to get reform-minded officials elected" to Metro Council, met last Thursday night to thrash out the "what and why" problems of the TTC.

"It will take the TTC 90 years to make a profit on the new Spadina subway system," Sue Sparrow of Reform Metro said. Yet the TTC in its attempt to save money is cutting back on essential bus routes "without considering the travel patterns of Metro citizens," she explained.

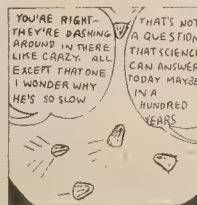

In their continuing battle to improve public transit, four of the six panelists, Jan Marmorek from Energy Probe, Irene Harris of the Labour Council, Hugh Mackenzie, NDP researcher, and David White, Chairman of the Committee and Ward 1 Alderman, "identified and produced the voting record of the TTC."

"It will be necessary to kick out several municipal politicians" before public transit can be improved, Liz White, committee researcher and wife of David White said.

Reform Metro actively fought the recent TTC fare increases. Formed in 1974 as a vehicle to initiate reform in municipal politics, the committee, with a membership of 400, became electoral in September 1977.

According to Liz White, "Reform Metro dealt almost exclusively with policy in the past." But presently it has initiated a series of Public Agenda Review meetings to examine such issues as Toronto Transit.

Columbo clever & elegant Variable Cloudiness.

By John Robert Colombo
Hounslow Press, 1977.
$2.75.

Variable Cloudiness, a collection of new poems by John Robert Colombo is, despite the title, a sunny experience. It aspires for the most part to very little more than a romp in the everyday world of everyday language, but it does provide the attentive reader with a few tasty morsels along the way and, occasionally, with an interesting flower to pick from the foliage.

Colombo is enamoured of all things to do with words — quotations, place names, found poems, word sounds, the alphabet, jokes, proverbs, concrete poems, aphorisms, acrostics — the stuff, in short, of verbal play. "The Federal Constituencies", for example, a poem based on the names of electoral ridings across the country, includes lines like "You hinted you were pregnant at Bonavista-Trinity-Conception," which, although they go rather a long way for an easy joke, are not without a certain charm. There is, of course, a limit to how much one can make of place names, even Canadian ones. Fortunately Colombo knows the limit and doesn't exceed it.

So we get a lively collection of word games that exemplify the variability and richness of everyday language by placing it in a startling context.

By means of this verbal play Colombo infuses his more serious, original poems with the rootedness and vivacity of common speech. In this regard the book is like a well tended garden; from the soil of well packed verbiage Colombo manages to cultivate a few modest but interesting flowers. The few genuine poems in the book are written with a simplicity that renders them almost elegant. One example must suffice to illustrate. These are the last few lines from the final poem in the collection. It is rather ironically entitled, "The Grand Adventure".

*Things change, remain the same, for me.
Evenings, in bed, before drifting off to sleep
It occurs to me: Death is now a night nearer.*

*So I find myself wondering, dreaming about
The staid and asymmetrical stars."*

The first line is vague, philosophical, while the second is quite concrete. Their juxtaposition serves to illustrate what might be called the actuality of the universal.

That "things change, remain the same" (one notes the lack of a conjunction, denoting, perhaps, simultaneity) is demonstrated by the action of going to sleep once again, for the first time under these specific circumstances and yet in the same manner as usual. The strong cesura in the following line and the heavy stress falling on the word "Death" serve to accentuate the shock of the narrator's realization of the inevitability of his end. There is a brief, effective return to the meditative tone of the second line and then the startling presentation of the "staid and asymmetrical stars," an evocative image of eternity, nature's indifference and, once again, of the universal in daily experience. In this poem and others Colombo seeks his effects, not in verbal play, but in the deft manipulation of rhythm. One might go so far as to suggest that the contrast between the ordinary words and the subtle rhythm points up the essential paradox and meaning of the poem; that everyday experience is imbued with significance; that the actual (the language) is impregnated by the abstract (the rhythm).

Given its linguistic context the original poetry merits some thought. There are, for example, interesting differences between the found or partly found poems and the genuine ones. In the former Colombo is usually telling a joke or toying with language, while in the latter he is more often somber and reflective, as if he were surveying his domain and judging it not entirely good. The title "Variable Cloudiness" is accurate in this regard. Colombo is kind to the world, but he never overlooks its unpleasant aspect.

Reading "Variable Cloudiness" one can't help but feel that there is really no distance between this poet and his poetry. The poems, whether found, translated or created are an expression of Colombo's eclectic sensibility. His success lies in his selection of verbal grist for the mill and in the several savvy poetic loaves he bakes from the flour.

Duellists pierce heart of darkness

Based on a short story by Joseph Conrad, The Duellists traces the history of a senseless, murderous quarrel between two officers in the armies of Napoleon.

The truculent Lieutenant Feraud suffers an imagined slight at the hands of one Lieutenant D'Hubert. Enraged, Feraud challenges him to a duel and loses, though not conclusively.

For sixteen years thereafter, far and wide over Europe, whenever the two meet, Feraud forces the hapless D'Hubert on his honour as gentleman and officer to fight again. Sometimes one wins, sometimes the other; the results are always bloody.

When the wars are finally over both men find themselves retired as generals, D'Hubert in rather more comfortable circumstances than his enemy. Still the two have energy and nerve enough for one last deadly contest.

It sounds like rather swashbuckling, Errol Flynn stuff, but in truth this is an earnestly-crafted reflection of Conrad's preoccupation with the contrast between our surface world of civilization and light, and the underlying horror of the heart of darkness.

The problem is that for all the artistry with which the contrast is conveyed, the necessary narrative drive is lacking: There is no suspenseful journey in search of a mysterious Kurtz.

Rather we meet the horrid Feraud in the very first scene, duelling with some unfortunate yokel. We realize immediately what he stands for when, having skewered his victim, and finding that his blade has jammed between the man's ribs, he throws up his hands and contemptuously stalks away.

From here on, every second scene seems to find the protagonists squaring off at dawn on some god-forsaken meadow. The reason for the controversy is deliberately left obscure, properly so perhaps. But surely we may expect more for our ninety minutes of attention than a constant repetition of the simple fact that evil is abroad in the world and lurks in the hearts of men.

For all this, the film is a beautiful thing to look at, in the same manner as that other historical drama that goes nowhere, Kubrick's Barry Lyndon.

This is the first feature-length effort by the English director, Ridley Scott. His background in set design and television is quite apparent. There is an old-fashioned staginess to most of the scenes, the sort of homey, doll's-house artificiality which English television handles so effortlessly (and our own CBC so badly) and which I find quite engaging.

Scott reinforces his theme with a painterly use of light and shade: slanting afternoon sunlight bathes people and landscapes in honey tones while casting long, sinister shadows behind everything. There is almost never a view of clear sky without menacing clouds gathering somewhere. The early morning duels always take place in a watery, lifeless atmosphere.

Armand D'Hubert (Keith Carradine) is tall, blond, aristocratic and somewhat ascetic. He is forever rational but accommodating, so much so that it takes him an eternity to transcend the old code of honour, which he could never define, and to arrive at new and satisfactory values for himself.

Feraud (Harvey Keitel) on the other hand is talky, dark, with pinched face and clouded eyes. An Emperor worshipper and fantastic grudge bearer, he uses the gentleman's code as a license for murder.

Nonetheless, we cannot help feeling some respect for the doggedness with which he resists the post-Napoleonic order of things while D'Hubert prospers as a realist if not a royalist.

It is regrettable that the film's producers found it necessary to cast Americans in the leading roles for the sake of transatlantic distribution. Carradine and Keitel are supported by a number of English performers whose theatrical West End style is much better suited to this sort of picture. Foremost among these is Albert Finney who gives us a marvellous cameo as Fouché, the French Minister of Police.

A final note on the fight scenes: the swordplay is in keeping with the period and is very different from modern fencing. Present-day fencers might regret the lack of attention paid to the wit and science which is the essence of their sport. The camera does not dwell on the action the way, for example, it does on the dancing in The Turning Point.

In the context though, it is appropriate that the mechanics should be glossed over in favour of the passion, suspense and stomach-turning physical damage experienced by the combatants. The only time body movements are followed in a sustained fashion is during a duel with rapiers, and then the contestants' mincing, formalized postures only serve to heighten the absurdity of their dispute.

David Hamer

A lyrical film for Everyman

Italian film director Ettore Scola's latest work A Special Day is magnificent; less comic than Scola's earlier films, but with all the lyrical warmth and gentleness that has characterized his earlier films, all the technical inventiveness, and all the careful integration of political themes with the story of ordinary people and their ordinary lives.

Sophia Loren is a housewife who is perpetually keeping house for her husband, a petty official in the Italian fascist regime of the thirties, and her six or seven children (they run in and out so fast it's hard to tell). She is exhausted, brutalized and degraded. Her husband goes off to a fascist rally with her children, but she stays home because, as a catty fellow tenant remarks, "Oh yes, you don't have a maid!"

She meets Marcello Mastroianni, a fellow-lodger, when her Mynah escapes and he helps recapture it. They both are awkward, both want to see more of each other, but then suddenly she leaves. Later he brings her a book she has been asking about, and invites himself for coffee. She begins primping herself for him (creating an artful curl on her forehead), but then she is warned by the concierge that he is a subversive. She is shocked, but still very attracted to him; she begins to kiss him passionately while on the roof, all the while begging him to "Go away!" He does not respond; she is puzzled, and he finally tells her that he is homosexual. The rest of the film is about, first, her violently negative response to this, then her acceptance of him and her eventual seduction of him before the husband and the children arrive back from the rally (the first visit of Hitler to fascist Italy).

Then it is about the empathetic bond that has grown up between them, and at last about the disappearance from her life of this man who is sympathetic to her because he is the same sort of victim as she is: they both meet with resourcefulness and humour the suffering inflicted upon them by the insensitivity of the Mussolini regime. He disappears because he is being taken away to an internment camp in one of the islands. And the film ends, after he has been taken away, with Sophia in her apartment undressing for bed. She climbs into bed, the bed of her husband who has told her, "We'll celebrate tonight. We'll call the seventh Adolf."

Magnificent film. Deeply affecting. If all political films worked as profoundly on the human and the emotional level as this one, then nobody would ever have to wonder whether politics could be a suitable subject for a film which aspired to the status of art.

Vishnevskaya triumphs in spite of her voice

Ever since her 1961 Met debut as Aida, Russian soprano Galina Vishnevskaya has been counted among the world's most engaging singing actresses. Her recital in the MacMillan Theatre last Sunday, a rare treat for Torontonians, was a fruit of the increased creative activity that accompanies any departure from the Soviet Union. She and husband Rostropovich were asked to go on permanent tour after the couple offered shelter to Solzhenitsyn in 1974.

Her renown in the West has centred on her broad, effective acting (which I haven't had the luck to witness), powerful interpretive command, and irresistible stage presence, aided by potent good looks. While her operatic repertoire includes much of Verdi and Puccini as well as Tchaikovsky and Moussorgsky (Wagner and Strauss are discouraged in the Soviet Union), her song performances are strictly Russian. Sunday's recital suggested to me both why her Russian performances are so exceedingly fine and why her success with Brahms and Schubert might be limited.

No one could call Vishnevskaya's voice beautiful. The volume is there — but it blankets the hall more than it fills it. At its worst her voice is distressingly flat and stale; at its best it draws no attention to itself. A leap of a fourth can entirely reverse its timbre (I think opera people call this "the Russian Wobbles") and difficult melodic lines, like that of Tchaikovsky's "Serenade" reveal an embarrassing lack of technique.

Coat that medicine with the sugar of her undeniable power as a performer, and you have today's type par excellence of the first class artist with second class equipment, today's Mary Garden. The force and personality of Vishnevskaya's singing guarantees her success, even if the sound is terrible, as it was in the "Lullaby" from Rimsky's Sadko. And when she has a good hold on her voice — as in Rachmaninoff's "Powder and Paint", Stravinsky's "Russian Maiden's Song" and Glinka's "I remember a wonderful moment" — the results are immortal.

Vishnevskaya's rendering of Russian is said to be immaculate — something I can't comment on. When I talk about the power of her interpretations, I am reacting to a quality of sincerity we assume accompanies a thorough understanding of lyrics. She avoids German lieder presumably because they would afford her neither a perfect understanding of the text (Russian songs) nor an opportunity to act (opera in any language). It's worth noting that in the sixties Vishnevskaya often sang Verdi in Russian while other leads babbled back in the original.

Rare Brahms well done

The eccentricity of my tastes was revealed to me by the poor attendance last Friday of a delightful chamber recital in the St. Lawrence Centre. A program of neglected works by great composers is something I would prefer not to miss; particularly if one composer is Brahms, since the inattention paid to any of his work is certainly attributable rather to the inconvenience of the medium than the poverty of the message.

Friday's program consisted in two-piano and four-hands works by Brahms and Schumann, and some largely familiar songs by those composers. The performers were the well known domestic pianists Kathryn Root and Elyakim Taussig, and baritone Gary Relyea. Mr. Relyea has an average, medium-strength voice, and an inclination toward emotionalism which serves Schumann somewhat better than Brahms. His method with a selection of the latter master's Op. 32 songs in some ways lacked sophistication; "Der Strom" and "Nicht mehr" in particular suffered from plainly conversational phrasing, heavy diction, and a tendency to croon. Relyea's Schumann was simple, moving and accurate, and made an altogether better impression.

Taussig and Root aren't the only part-time two-piano act around, but one of the few that remember that increased complexity, not increased volume, is the virtue of the two-piano setting. They achieved cooperation and good part-playing largely by avoiding the big sound, and their remarkably clear and beautiful Boesendorfers were ideal tools. Solid, thoughtful musicianship characterized most of their playing, and they displayed an unusually good head for Brahms.

The Schumann Andante and Variations, Op. 46 sounded somewhat underpractised, but Brahms's Op. 23 variations were very clean and fluid. The major number on the program was the two-piano version of the Brahms Haydn Variations, which the duo played briskly, thoughtfully and without sentimentality. The fleetness of variations five and six were stunning, and the part-writing of the final variation could not have been represented more clearly. I hope Root and Taussig will consider for a future program the two-piano version of the Piano Quintet.

Rock'n'roll triumphs over art more than the guitar, are the vocals of Hunter. Courageously singing in spite of obvious sinus problems, his voice sounds comfortable in various inflections, and is quite effective in bridging the transitions in dramatic mood. One only wishes that there was more substance to what he was singing.

Steve Petranik

Brian Eno's music is largely electronic, filled with bizarre lyrics and fraught with psychological concerns. He will bring out an album of unrelenting drone and yet paradoxically he was one of the founding members of the melody-rich Roxy Music. He builds most of his own instruments and yet claims to know little about music. Esoteric. That's what he is, esoteric.

In what just might be a move to extradite himself from this uncompromising position, Eno's new album Before and After Science, is a marked departure from his previous works, including Another Green World. That album, a fascinating collection of uncategorizable 'tone pictures' was primarily instrumental. This new album, however, places an uncharacteristically strong emphasis on lyrics. Vocals have never been Eno's strongest point and even though he does write fascinating lyrics "Baby's on fire-Better throw her in the water-Look at her laughing-Like a heifer to the slaughter" he is inevitably upstaged by his instrumentation. Indeed, he even tends to treat the voice as an instrument; running it through umpteen electronic gadgets and blending it with the other instruments.

This shift in emphasis gives this album a much warmer tone than the bulk of his previous work. Now, to the uninitiated that may seem like a positive factor, but to the Eno fan it is more than a little disconcerting. Eno's preoccupation with electronics and his decidedly anti-romantic notions of art (he considers himself a 'mechanic' as opposed to a musician) have lead him to create a music which is icily cerebral. It is highly textured but artificial and oh so controlled. It is an adroit reflection of the chrome-and-glass seventies. That is what the true Eno fan admires. And that is the quality that is missing from this album.

Not to despair, however. Nothing Eno does is a complete write off (with the possible exception of a piece of nonsense called No Pussyfooting, but I prefer to blame Robert Fripp for that fiasco). This album is the most accessible thing the man has done. There is no one tune which can stand up to "Baby's on Fire" or "Sombre Reptiles" but the songs on this album are eminently palatable. "Backwater" and "King's Lead Hat" are the best cuts. They strike a nice balance between vocals and instrumentation without giving the upper hand to either.

Backup personnel on this disc include Phil Manzanera, Phil Collins and Percy Jones. Also in the line-up is the visual artist Peter Schmidt and included with the disc are four very nice reproductions of several of his watercolours.

Anyway. This is a relatively accessible album by a consciously inaccessible character. Whether or not this disc was planned as a token for the masses is hard to say. It would serve as an excellent introduction to Brian Eno but it is hard for us true believers to think of him condescending to mere mortals. Suffice to say that it's good, but I was expecting God.

Paul Budra

Rock'n'roll has unfortunately been short-changed on its share of witty performers. Unfortunate, because the nature of the musical form and its surrounding social milieu could be the subject of many satiric jabs. But instead, we get too many lyricists who couldn't write their way out of an ounce-bag. And with the release of the new Ian Hunter album, Overnight Angels, the situation seems to be deteriorating.

After the brilliantly satiric All-American Alien Boy, his previous album, Hunter has retreated into the insulated safety of rock clichés as lyrical themes. We have songs about love, Broadway, being free, and so on. But even at this snail's pace, Hunter's lyrical wit outdistances most, and the disc contains several minor linguistic triumphs.

The real triumphs on the album, however, are in presentation. Rather than merely picking up a band to play on his studio albums as he has since he broke up with Mott and Hoople, now he has a set band naturally called the Overnight Angels. Their sound is well integrated and fluid, versatile enough to provide a hard rock sound as well as a full almost orchestral arrangement. Most songs utilize a piano melody line within the context of a simple rhythm. The little lead guitar that is heard usually toys with the tone of the song, tracing it through all moods.

There I was, almost. My physical body sat hunched over my twenty-fourth Export at a table in the smoky but tasteful surroundings of the Gasworks directly in front of the bass horn of the 4,000 watt P.A. My mind, however, was reveling, nay, rejoicing in the glorious sound that came out of the said machine. The sound of Goddo.

Now, I will be the first to admit that I had consumed a quantity of alcohol that bordered on the immoderate that night. And, after I left the Gasworks, my grip of reality was none too sure. But I knew that I had heard the best bar band in Toronto that evening and therefore resolved to stumble into a record store and buy their new disc. This being accomplished I stumbled home and passed out.

Several days later I had recovered sufficiently to play the album which I had purchased while "under the influence". Imagine my shock at discovering that said album, cunningly entitled Who Cares was a fake. Three average not very innovative rock musicians had brought out a mediocre album under the name of Goddo. The album had a few cute songs, such as in "Cock On" and "Carol Kiss My Whip", but it was not the musical dynamo that I had heard in the pub. It was silly, redundant, and made some painfully inept attempts at humour.

Finding it impossible to believe that such a hoax had been pulled I resolved to go to Knob Hill, where Goddo was playing, and personally tell those talented musicians that their name was being used for fraudulent purposes. By the time the band came on stage I found that I could not stand. Someone had put something in my drink. I suspect it was alcohol.

So there I sat, unable to tell the best bar band in the city that their name had been misused by a group of mediocre hacks. But what the hell. The best is the best. Especially when you've had a few.

Paul Budra

Many have described the English rock'n'roll band, Streetwalkers, as being dazzling, eclectic, and dynamic in concert, perhaps being the greatest aesthetic experience of the twentieth century. To do their concerts justice in a recorded form, would have required a four album set complete with holograms.

Critics have ranked their new live album right up there with Wagner's Ring Cycle, Milton's Paradise Lost, the Sistine Chapel, Griffiths' Birth of a Nation, Hamlet and Swan Lake, as a cultural masterwork, nay a milestone in aesthetic consciousness of mankind. A German critic commented: "Ich bin ein Waschschloppen. Wunderbar." Others have called it a wonderful expression of our Zeitgeist — a symbol of man.

But this reviewer begs to differ. Though never having seen them in concert, this album, Streetwalkers Live, recording emphasizes tedium at the expense of diversity. All are boogie songs, you know-people's music — no nonsense rock'n'roll, songs for drinking and screwing. Nothing wrong with music like that — in small doses. But four sides is a bit much. The only break is an excellent ballad "My Friend the Sun", which appropriately enough was originally a Family song, a band in which the lead vocalist and guitarist were formerly members.

Sadly, the versatility that Family as consistently able to demonstrate is not in evidence on this double live set. It seems that they can do only one type of music, and effective as they are in producing this sound, one's attention span is sorely tested. In fact the imagination used in the cover design sincerely reflects the tone of the album.

Seeking modern art roots

Frank Stella: Jan. 28 to Feb. 11, the Sable-Castelli Gallery.
Eric Atkinson: Jan. 31 to Feb. 16, the Pollock Gallery

Both artists are well established:
Stella through his art and Atkinson through his teaching. The former is a young American who is thought to be destined for great things, and the latter is British-Canadian who for long has been holding various administrative positions in art education.

Both shows seem to be an indication of present-day search for the roots of the modern artistic tradition. The two artists explore areas which parallel the post First World War European tradition.
Stella now does constructivism in his three-dimensional compositions with arbitrary geometrical figures, reminiscent of Tatlin and Braque.
Stella is recognizable by his own unique colour harmonies and,
perhaps, affection for metallic paints.
Nothing else really will lead you to believe that this man has done all these strip-paintings of his previous career. In addition every painting has an inspiring name like "Green Solitaire" or "Inaccessible Island".

All of them are made from brand-new material, the pride of architectural model making, that looks a lot like cardboard.

Atkinson, on the other hand, refuses to experiment with the unknowns. His paintings are solid and thought out like Toyota cars. The harmonies are sound, the colours are economical and restrained. God wanted to make another Miro, but without the old one's colour range.

Stella is very much respected for his strip-painting and colour-field experiments. His experiments now touched on the radically new ground of shape-experimentation. Now he tries new forms that he can relate to his previous colour experiments. The paintings that are exhibited are coming directly from the artist's studio. The latest word. The return to cubism is very significant for we all have a lot to learn from early Picasso and Braque.

The validity of three-dimensional painting cannot be impeached with Socratic rigour. But it seems, that no artist so far has conquered the medium to the extent where the medium can extricate itself from the uncomfortable position between sculpture and the two-dimensional painting.

Lisa survives hype

On January 25 at the Colonial Lisa dal Bello made her Toronto club debut. The audience could hardly have been better primed than they were because the publicity attendant to her debut was as heavy as I have ever seen.

If you've read all those comparisons of Lisa dal Bello to Aretha Franklin and Natalie Cole, forget them. She has a much harder, R & B but more rhythm than blues, style. At the risk of being parochial she and her band reminded me of Carol Pope and Rough Trade, except that they are much harder sounding than Rough Trade. Of course, Lisa dal Bello does not have 'that delightfully twisted sense of humour that is Carol Pope's trademark. She does write all her own material on her first album and that's pretty good for being only nineteen.

She presented a very balanced set of straight-ahead good-time funk and catchy, romantic ballads on Wednesday night, the latter being particularly effective as she is, frankly, rather beautiful. I find it hard to believe that the CBC has spawned a worthwhile contribution to white soul, but Lisa has been singing for them since she was 16, and it looks like she has a better than average chance to make it.

Mirth makes music

Allison Reynolds and Pat Watson are a talented pair of folkies who have always fared well out in the country but never quite made it in the big city. Watson and Reynolds were always a versatile duo, playing guitar, cello, flute, and keyboards, but recently they have joined forces with David James Bowen, a singer-songwriter by profession. The ensuing trio perform under the name Mirth.

The trio have just brought out their first album First Borne, a collection of folk-rock, country-folk, and even a touch of Nashville. The broad range and wide instrumentation provides for a varied set, although at times the vocal arrangements are weak. Unfortunately the producers have seen fit to play down the vocal harmonies and instead use echo to fill out the lead vocal.

As a result, the singer sounds a trifle isolated. Without a doubt, the highlight is Bowen's "Trucker's Lament" a touching little ditty about a heavenly hippie trucker.

All in all, First Borne is a fine debut album from a talented trio. The material and music are strong, but it is to be hoped that production-wise their next effort will be a little more polished.

De-Irished Rovers tepid folk ensemble

At the Imperial Room the silver glistens, the service is immaculate and the dance music sweet and sentimental. The (Irish) Rovers take over the stage — and try to inject a little synthetic riot. We enjoy it, tap our toes — but are merely entertained. These swaying sexagenarians in front of us, however, are in uproar.

Chief Rover, Will Millar's patter interferes with the music when he implores the patrons to join any and all choruses. Most do. The humour is mildly obscene and moderately funny. The music is very competent, the voices good; but the over-all impression is one of faded fire.

Millar shows more depth of knowledge and personality than he allows himself on stage. He shows a sound knowledge of Celtic and pop music, but insists that it is melody and lyrics which he loves. He harps on the notion, also advanced by his hysters, that he and he alone wants to transform the band out of its

"Irishness" and deal with the folk music to be found around the world.

The band has outlasted its competition: but we can hear better — that is, more lively or more traditional folk — in abundance every summer at Mariposa. A few of the songs they promote — The Band Played Waltzing Matilda, for example, a pacifist song from Australia — are worthy of greater circulation. But much of the rest are merely shortened versions of popular folk tunes, played without the variations which delight a folk audience. It seemed, ultimately, as if The Rovers had not abandoned their Irishness, but their fine tuning, by accepting this one remaining club date in a life which now consists almost exclusively of concert tours.

But we did enjoy hob-nobbing. This year I wore a tie, and the maitre d' smiled. It almost made it worthwhile.

John Wilson

Non-revisionist Irish folk music

While storm-struck Torontonians were fighting their way to the comfortable refuge of the local bars last Thursday night, some two hundred odd souls were forging their way bravely to the warmth and light musical delight provided by Barde at Convocation Hall. Barde is a French-Canadian group with definite Irish overtones, which specialize in the traditional folk music of the Celtic persuasion. The group consists of six musicians, all male, who play a variety of instruments including violin, guitar, banjo, recorder, tambourine, and last but not least the wonderful tin flute (better known as the penny whistle).

The quality of the musicianship was excellent, and the recreation of tradition was notably faithful. The traditional reels and jigs were usually instrumental and fairly short. My own preference was for the a cappellas and the ballads which displayed the singers' talents for unusual harmony.

Perhaps one disconcerting feature of the performance was that it was just that. The music Barde produces makes it very difficult for one to remain seated for very long. In fact, some of the more bubbly folks in the audience just could not resist, and jumped up to do their own jigging to the delight, I am sure, of the group.

Barde will be back in Toronto the second week of February to participate in "Canada and the Celtic Consciousness" so whether you are French-Canadian, Irish-Canadian or just plain Canadian, I am sure the performance will have you all jigging and reeling from beginning to end.

Electronic Design Engineers

Burroughs' new Engineering and Manufacturing plant in Winnipeg requires highly creative engineers with doctoral or masters degrees in electronic engineering or related fields to work in the Engineering Department.

Burroughs Corporation is a worldwide computer manufacturing and operating company with 61 plants in 10 countries. There are excellent opportunities for advancement within the organization.

The Winnipeg Design Department presently employs over 40 people actively engaged in the design of advanced computer memories. Suitable candidates should have detailed knowledge of one or more of these fields:—

- Control theory.
- Analog /digital conversion.
- Active and passive filters.
- Phase-locked loops.
- Electro-optics.

Burroughs offers challenging assignments, excellent working conditions, good employee benefits including a stock purchase plan, and competitive salaries.

Winnipeg has excellent housing, shopping, cultural and recreational facilities.

If you are self-motivated, ambitious, and would like to join a progressive design team,

Stage Fright proves frightfully trite

Last Wednesday evening I went to see Stage Fright, the New College musical review now showing at Wetmore Cafeteria. I should have stayed home and talked to the cockroaches.

Stage Fright is boring and diffuse. Given that it is an amateur production, however, the ineptitude might be forgiven were it not for the offensive nature of the material.

The show consists of a series of sketches revolving around several themes, all of which are treated in the most mawkish way possible. It is as if director Jim Betts decided to gear the production to the most mundane elements in contemporary suburban society.

One such theme parades under the phony guise of women's "liberation." In a sketch entitled "Show Down," for example, a sheriff in a western town falls in love with a bar room singer who, we are led to believe, is virtuous. He wants to marry her and have her cook for him, wash his clothes and look after his children;

she seems ready to comply. All is not well, however, for in comes a gang of female desperadoes and their leader, Dirty Dolly. Dolly wants to be sheriff. There is a showdown, Dolly wins, the male sheriff dies, the female victor walks over and, in a symbolic gesture, removes the badge and pins it to herself. Bourgeois replaces bourgeois; female reactionary replaces male reactionary; nothing, in fact, has changed. This "war between men and women" has nothing to do with liberation and is, in so far as it substitutes female chauvinism for male chauvinism, quite sexist.

Among the most nauseating scenes was one which portrayed a group of little girls at a slumber party indulging in obvious adolescent sexual double entendre. Their lack of naivete was supposed to be amusing. Another idiotic vignette gave us a young woman leaving home for the first time to go off to school. It was, ironically enough, an accurate representation of the sentimental, moribund, dying world of the suburbs. "We came through", a song by several supposedly long married couples, told of their affairs.

arguments, drunkenness, self-serving ambitions and loneliness and ended with a repeat of the title as if to suggest everything turns out all right.

Surprisingly enough there were a few creditable performances. Leslie Dicker, Wendy Hedderwick and Steve MacDonald sang very well and Greg Reed has obvious talent for comedy. "Mirror, Mirror" by Mag Ruffman and Margaret Warren, was an interesting, even somewhat poignant sketch. Unfortunately, however, a few good performances could not overcome the horrid material.

No Exit: Welcome to my nightmare

Sartre almost makes you reach for razor blades or send them to someone you know. Dead or alive it all looks the same to Sartre and No Exit is no exception. There is sex after death, and I have seen it, but it is apt to leave you cold.

U.C. Playhouse was hell for a few days last week. There are no hot iron pokers or whips and chains; Sartre's hell is a plush living room where a charming trio talk each other to death. Three characters play a neat little game called tormentor and it goes on for ever and ever and ever. Whose side are you on?

The text of the play can be very exciting when handled with imagination. The claiming of territory and patterns of behavior are well developed by Sartre. The play's themes are damning, but also strangely amusing. When we laugh we might ask ourselves why. This is Sartre's intention and in small doses it is tolerable. The Playhouse production is just sweet enough to swallow; there is enough humor to ease the play down.

Three is definitely a crowd. The tug-of-war for attention keeps the play moving and the actors must be sharp. The blocking and pace of this production was a disappointment. The spatial layout of the set worked for no one. It was distracting. A bit of imagination in design could have given a very impressive frame to the action. The design may be timeless: Satan may be a surrealist or a futurist. Why not? If hell is stark that shouldn't mean boring.

Ruthven Earle was simply divine as the butch Inez; she made one glad her spike heels and finger nails are not longer. Baby killer Estelle (Margaret Lamarre) gave us everything we expected from a mean lover. She danced through the play with a vicious ease that was very frightening and very professional.

However, director Anna Schon would have a devilish triangle if she knew what to do with Raymond Lefebvre as Garcin.

The Playhouse let us in for no charge, but would they let us out.

Apologies are in order. To the cast and director of Volpone: your production was excellent and we deeply regret that we had to cut the lengthy and complimentary review which was prepared due to a depressing lack of space.

And now, this week on campus: At the Studio on Glen Morris, Johan, Johan the Husband, an interlude with the addition of dancing — tonight and tomorrow, free but reserve for the 8:30 show by dropping by or calling 978-8705. Last two nights for Company at Hart House Theatre; call 978-8668. At New College, Stage Fright also runs two more shows, 8:30 at Welmore. And after Vic has hung up its track shoes, the Engineers romp onto HH stage for Skule Nite, prices being $3 and $3.50; the run begins next Wednesday. Again, call 978-8668 for reservations. All the above have an 8:30 curtain. Tonight, at Trinity, two non-revues, non-directed, (1) marking the Conversazione; shows featuring Coward and Simon. Admission somewhat restricted, as the plays are presented in Cartwright Hall.

Elsewhere: at the Aladdin Theatre, 2637 Yonge St., Maugham's The Constant Wife; each night this weekend at 8:30; call 482-5200 for reservations. A Space presents the Hummer Sisters in The Bible as Told to Karen Anne Quinlan, tonight and tomorrow at 9:30, 86 St. Nicholas St. At Factory Lab Theatre, 207 Adelaide St. E., Beyond Mozambique continues; call 864-9971 for rates.

At the Harbourfront, Queen's Quay, performances tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 of The Yellow House at Arles, a story of the confrontation between Van Gogh and Gauguin. Admission free. The Mime Company Unlimited, playing out of Unlimited Space, presents Intersection at 95 Danforth Ave. Call 461-6551 for rates; shows Tuesday to Saturday at 8:30 and a Sunday PWYC at 3:30. Pinter's Old Times holds the boards at the Phoenix, 390 Dupont; tonight at 8:00, tomorrow at 6:00 and 9:30, Sunday at 3:00, resumes at 8 on Tuesday. Call 922-7835 for reservations and rates.

At the Royal Alex, The Wiz has appeared in its road disguise. Call 363-4211. Schubert's Cabaret continues with Marlene, Marlene, shows tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 and 11; during the week, from Tuesday on, at 8:30; reserve at 961-2460. Second City presents Once More With Feeling at Jarvis & Richmond; call 363-1674 for all details. Likewise the Teller's Cage, at Commerce Court, is breaking in Hold Mel with 9:00 shows, with 8:00 and 11:00 starts on Saturdays; call 862-1434 for pricing. The Theatre in the Dell continues Sweet City Lights with 9:00 curtain, except the weekend when they commence at 8:00 and 10:30. Call 598-4802, 300 Simcoe St. So much for cabaret.

At the Tarragon, Tremblay's St. Carmen of the Main continues at 8:30, Tuesday to Sunday, with a 2:30 Sunday matinee; call 531-1827 for reservations, which are essential. Following the conclusion of St. Carmen, the Midnight Opera will play for a limited run only, at the same location (30 Bridgeman St.) upstairs. It's a Theatre Passe Muraille seed show and I hear it's interesting. At the St. Lawrence, Toronto Arts presents the Athol Fugard script Sizwe Bansi Is Dead, Monday to Saturday at 8:00, Saturday matinee at 2:00; call 366-7723 for prices. At Toronto Free Theatre, The Spills runs Tuesday to Sunday at 8:00, with a Sunday matinee at 2:00; upstairs at 26 Berkeley St. Call 368-2856. Downstairs, Toronto Workshop's importation of Nothing To Lose, closing this weekend, three shows at 8:30 and a Sunday matinee at 2:30; call TWP, 12 Alexander St., at 925-8640 if you haven't seen The Club, running Tuesday to Friday at 8:30, Saturday at 6:00 and 9:00, Sunday at 2:30.

Toronto Truck make money on The Mousetrap, 94 Belmont, and make audiences, even critical ones, far happier with their production of Moliere's Imaginary Invalid, at their Colonnade location. Call 922-0084 for details.

A few oddities and exceptions: at the Todmorden Mills, the East Side Players present Angela In Love, a melodramatic comedy I assume, this weekend and next. Friday and Saturday nights at 8:30, student price $2.50. Call 423-5704; if this lives up to previous offerings, it's delightfully heavy-handed Edwardian stuff just right for the farcical disposition.

John

rock

The concert scene remains bleak. Even Ted Nugent has cancelled. ELP is at the Gardens tonight and tomorrow, but hopefully they will be the only ones. Santana will be at the Gardens on the 16th and Triumph and Rose will be at Massey on the 17th.

The club scene is just as tedious. Robert E. Lee will be at the Nickelodeon, John Hammond will be at the Horseshoe, Hott Rottz will be at the Chimney and Another Pretty Face will be at the Gasworks tonight. The Colonial has the James Cotton Blues Band and the Groaning Board has Short Tum.

What nonsense. Look, forget the downtown pubs. Fortify yourself with some curious liquid, grab a dollar and head down to the UC pub to catch heavy-metal-schmucks Goddo. Really, if you've had a few, they can be a lot of fun.

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans!!! Zoot Sims keeps cooking away this week and next at Bourbon St. Zoot is undoubtedly the finest living swing tenor player.

Jungle Man Moe Koffman leads his dynamic quintet this weekend at George's, followed all next week by the Vern Dorge Quartet.

Bassist Jim Dorsey and his group continue their engagement at Cafe Soho tonight and tomorrow after hours. Creative modern jazz to titillate the aesthetic senses.

Sunday at 3 p.m. finds The Message at the Music Gallery, 30 Patrick St. This group plays their avant-garde New York music although they were formerly indigenous here. Anyone who visited the short-lived 255 College St. club will see familiar faces such as Carlton Vaughan in the group.

The Science Centre brings in Oscar Peterson's former bassist Dave Young on Monday. He'll be performing with guitarist Ed Bickert and one other.

Tomorrow Peter Appleyard entertains on vibraphone, 3-6 p.m. at Stop 33 in the Sutton Place. Hefty cover.

Hart House presents Arrival with Earl Marek on Wednesday at noon.

Dixeland: the Climax Jazz Band at Zeld's Thursday to Saturday, and at Harborfront Sunday night; the Silverleaf Jazz Band at the free Eaton's Centre concert tonight 5-7 p.m. Dr. McJazz at the Brunswick all week; and John Arpin usual at the Chelsea Bun.

movies

Friday: Mirabile dictus Sebastiane is still at the New Yorker. I suggest that you organize your Latin 100 course for a field trip. Also educational is the U of T Films showing of A Clockwork Orange, particularly for sociologists and MBAs. Psychology 245, on the other hand, is meeting at the Revue for The Passenger and Claude Lelouch's Another Man, Another Chance. Near Eastern Studies and plastic surgery at Lumiere for Casablanca and Dark Passage. And, for history majors there's The Tower of London, at the Science centre.

Saturday: Nothing new except the short course in elementary metallurgy which Cinema Gratis has mounted at Med. Sci. Aud. — How to Marry a Millionaire and Some Like It Hot.

Sunday: The AGO's series of American melodramas continues to demonstrate the vast distance between cinematic art and the taste of the public. This week they're showing The Chase which, I seem to recall ran for two meagre weeks at the NorthWest Drive-In twelve years ago. Innis has Eisenstein's Ten Days That Shook The World and Keaton's The General at 7:30, and cartoons all afternoon. The Revue has Bergman and mirrors with Persona and Face To Face.

Monday: Lumiere begins a short run of Panic In Needle Park and Walkabout. Otherwise time stands still.

Tuesday: The German series continues at the Science Centre, call at 429-0454.

art

St. Mike's art contest draws to a close (Deadline Feb. 10) in preparation for their Visual Arts Week near the end of February. The competition is open to U of T students, faculty, and alumni with a limit of three submissions in each of the mediums of painting, graphics, sculpture, film (16 mm or Super 8... especially of your girlfriend), and photography. Submissions should be given to Frank Beltrano or Ronni Rosenberg at St. Mike's Student Union Office.

Downstairs at Hart House, Ron Baker's colour paintings will be exhibited starting Wednesday, and running till Feb. 24. Moose and Queen-ophiles should check out the show and sale of Charles Pachter's prints and posters downstairs in Victoria College's New Academic Building. Till Feb. 10.

The AGO is in rare form these days with stellar exhibitions by 19th century watercolourists from Britain and Canada, a well done mass exhibition of Lawren Harris's Urban Scenes and Wilderness Paintings till 1930, a medium rare show of Michael Mitchell's photography on Nightlife, and a continuing series of video artists in their series In Video. A Space is also into the video act with Ian Murray's work. Asymptote on Feb. 9. Contemporary Native Art of Canada has a lot of fans and Alex Janvier is a leading exponent of the movement. Till Feb. 22.

Vaclav Vaca's surreal paintings are at Hamilton's Florence Abbott Gallery but Toronto has some downtown shows a bit closer to house and heart. Roberts Gallery opens a show of A. J. Casson's paintings on Wednesday, the Prince Arthur Galleries feature Lee Walser, a noted California artist. (Feb. 4-28), Frank Stella is at the Sable-Castelli Gallery till Feb. 28, Barry Argyle's collages are at Nancy Poole's Studio, and today is the last day at the Isaacs Gallery for Andrew Smith's Naked Clothing.

But if you do anything this week, stop in at the Albert White Gallery for an exhibition of engravings by Miro. ann classical

Local baritone Gary Cross gives a free recital of Beethoven, Vaughan Williams and Ravel tonight at eight in the Goethe Institute (one block north of the Rosedale station). The last three performances of Carmen in the CTS auditorium begin tonight, tomorrow and Sunday at eight. Different leads on each night.

Tomorrow night's Northstars Mozart concert features nothing less than the Guerrier Quartet and clarinetist James Campbell. Starts at 8:30 in Castle Frank High, tickets $4.50. I guess 'Beethoven at Hart' is supposed to sound like 'Coleman Hawkins at JAPT', but it looks like a good series anyway. Otto Armlin, Tsuyoshi Tsutsumi, and Elyakim Taussig play violin and cello sonatas in the Great Hall tomorrow at 8:30 and Sunday at 3:00. Tickets, if any remain, from the Porter.

Two other Sunday items: U of T Wind Symphony, 3:00 in the MacMillan Theatre (Hummel, Handel, Mahler) and (tenor Edward Wlens with Melville Cook, 8:00 in Metropolitan United (Brahms's 'Mädelone' Romances). Both are free.

The Tudor Singers of Montreal under Wayne Riddell perform in the St. Lawrence Monday at 8:30. Interesting program of Brahms, Schuetz, Hindemith, Bartok and Somers (no Elizabethans). $4.50, and $5.50.

Good visiting orchestras are seen here far too seldom — a real embarrassment to a big, tough, music city like Toronto. The Cleveland Orchestra under Orin Maazel plays in Massey Hall Monday and Tuesday at 8:30. Program includes Brahms's First, Schumann's Second, and Mozart's Marriage of Figaro Overture. Line up early for rush tickets, because it's a subscription event and everybody who isn't crazy wants to see it.

English baritone Richard Jackson sing Schubert, Schumann, Poulenc, and Faure in the St. Lawrence Centre Thursday at 8:30. Tickets are $5.50 and $6.50.

Blues Dethrone the Big Mac

By MARIA KALIN
and GLYNIS PETERS

Wednesday night the U. of T. women's hockey team put an end to the 14 game winning streak of McMaster University. Leading the Blues was veteran Linda Harley, who recorded a hat trick, including one unassisted effort in the second period. Noreen Lem, assisted by Cathy Brown, and Val Bush unassisted were good for two more goals, making the final score 5-1 for Toronto.

The Blues completely dominated the game, never letting up on the aggressiveness they demonstrated from the first face-off. Playing excellent positional hockey, the entire team put out a consistent 100 per cent effort. Although the win was without doubt a tribute to amazing team work and a sign that the team is really starting to come together, as always several individuals stand out.

Cathy Brown, turned in a remarkable effort shadowing Mac's best player Mern Conevy, successfully diminishing Mac's potent offence.

Mary Garland came through once again with exceptional goal tending as a frustrated Mac squad assailed her with powerful shots. Penny Meitz has worked hard with Garland during the season and the team must certainly be appreciative of this after last night's game. Garland is improving all the time and after letting in one goal in the first two minutes, she was unbeatable for the rest of the game.

Linda Harley continued to show why she is one of the best women hockey players in Ontario. Assisted by Jaye Westlake and Diane Wardrope she netted the first goal of the game and on a pass from Val Bush she signed off for the Blues with the last marker at 1:39 of the third period, leaving the ice with a hat trick to her credit.

After dealing this fatal blow to Mac, Toronto faces three home games next week. A win against Guelph on Monday night will assure the Blues of a play-off spot before they move on to play York on Thursday and Queen's on Friday.

Mac is a certainty for the play-offs. Guelph and Queen's each have two games to play and 10 pts.

Skiers Stick Together

By GLYNIS PETERS

The Cross-Country Ski team attended the biggest racing event in Canada held in Eldora this week-end, to which the top competitors in Eastern Canada were drawn.

On Saturday in the men's 16 kilometres Veli Niinimaa led Toronto by placing 19th out of 69 finishers, ceding higher spots to National and Provincial skiers. Toronto's strength lies in numbers, however, and eight skiers finished within a three minute span. Andre Laplante came 2nd for U of T with a time of 62:15 and Stephen Kummel came 9th with a time of 65:27 and between these two skiers were the other six members of Toronto's team. This same pack evolved on Sunday in the eight kilometre race, but in a more concentrated form as the span narrowed to one minute with Niinimaa way out in front again in 19th spot. Other than Niinimaa the team is lacking in stars but on the whole they present a solid group of strong skiers.

In the women's division on Sunday it was much the same story but with all the skiers finishing within the top 11 it appears that unlike the men they have a whole team of stars. Sue Rowley placed fourth followed less than two minutes later by Janice Parrott in sixth place leading the rest of the U of T pack. Mary Pearson, Taru Paakonon and Heather Chrysdale clinched the next three spots while Stefa Katamay, another flu victim, wrapped up 11th place.

The women's 3x4 relay team of Janice Parrott, Mary Pearson and Sue Rowley did extremely well, placing second only minutes behind the winners, Soo Finnish, who had a time of 55:33.

Out of 23 teams the men's relay team of Niinimaa, Dave Neelin, Paul Kemppainen, Paul Stapleton, Andre Laplante and Frazer Wright placed 10th.

A University Cup was awarded on Sunday based on the results of the top three men and the top two women of a team. Niinimaa, Eric Munn, Dave Neelin, Janice Parrott and Sue Rowley combined to win the Cup for U of T.

Toronto looks fairly strong in the university division but will have to look out for some strong competition from Guelph and Laurentian who seem to be the teams to beat.

Warriors Don't Put Up Much Of A Battle

By HOWARD DEANE

Three Toronto players scored hat tricks as the Hockey Blues demolished the Waterloo Warriors, 15-4, at Varsity Arena Wednesday night.

Cary Farelli, Larry Hopkins, and Neil Korzack led the scoring parade. Korzack, playing his first full game since the Blues played in Cornell, scored four goals, two of which were shorthanded efforts. Farelli also scored a shorthanded goal.

In their last five games the Blues have scored 53 goals. Coach Tom Watt "just can't believe it. We really felt that Waterloo would be working their asses off. They are fighting for a playoff spot."

It was the penalty-killing of the Blues that was the most spectacular. They had eight penalties against and only allowed one power play goal, while scoring three shorthanded goals. At one point they were down two men for over a minute and held off the Warriors.

The Warriors came out in the first period hitting hard and taking cheapshots. "That's the only way they figure they can play us," commented Hopkins "and yet it is us that get all the penalties."

Despite this, the Blues totally dominated the first period, outshooting the Warriors 20-8 and outscoring them 4-1.

Farelli, Korzack, Ron Harris and Hopkins picked up first period goals. Ken Greene potted the only Waterloo goal of the period, on a power play.

Waterloo played better in the second period but again were outscored 4-1. Doug Caines scored twice in nine seconds, and just missed his hat trick a few seconds later because of a good save by the Waterloo goalie. At this point the Blues were up 6-1.

Waterloo scored on a deflected slapshot, but Blues' centre Dan D'Alvise soon got that one back. With only 28 seconds left, Korzack scored his first of two shorthanded goals to put the Blues up 8-2 at the end of the period.

During the third period the Blues were at their best, scoring seven goals on only 13 shots.

Waterloo scored in the opening seconds but Farelli came back to even the score for the period.

After Blues' goalie, Dave Jenner was penalized for tripping, Korzack scored his second shorthanded goal on a breakaway. Seconds later Rocci Pagnello stickhandled around three Waterloo players and lofted the puck into the net.

Dan D'Alvise, Cary Farelli and Larry Hopkins swarm the Waterloo net.

Farelli completed his hat trick, just after Waterloo scored their final goal. He then went on to set up Hopkins twice to give the captain a hat trick.

Korzack ended the scoring at 18:34 of the third period. After Wednesday night's performance it's going to be hard to keep Korzack out of the lineup.

Under OUAA rules however a team can only dress seventeen players, and, "that means some good players have to sit out," said

Watt. Top scoring rearguard Rob Gemmell, fears "that this could hurt morale." But Hopkins feels that "on the ice we have a lot of spirit." This is evidenced by the play of the Blues this year; fourteen wins and one tie in 15 games.

Blues Rewriting Record Book

By JIM O'LEARY

The hockey Blues continue their quest for an undefeated season when they meet the Ottawa Gee Gees at Varsity Arena tonight. To date the Blues have won 14 and tied one of their 15 league games. In two meetings in Ottawa last week, several Blues fattened their scoring statistics as Toronto downed the Gee Gees 10-2 and 9-2.

In two meetings in Ottawa last week, several Blues fattened their scoring statistics as Toronto downed the Gee Gees 10-2 and 9-2.

If they remain unbeaten in their last five games, it will be the fourth time a U of T team has been undefeated in league play since 1954. In 1954-55 the Blues posted an 11-0-1 record. They bettered this to 17 straight victories in 1972-73. Their last undefeated year was 1973-74 when they posted an 18-0-1 record.

The Blues are also in position to break several team records. They need only nine more wins to break the mark of 33 wins they compiled last year. This figure includes all exhibition, league and playoff games.

The Blues are also assured of breaking the team record for goals in a season. At present they are only 36 short of breaking their season record of 272 goals. If they continue at their present 7.9 goals-a-game pace they will reach 272 in five games.

Another record likely to fall is power play goals in a season.

Several players are also on the verge of breaking individual records. Doug Caines and Cary Farelli are both in position to break the Blues single season scoring record.

At present Don Pagnutti holds the record for most points with 82 after 37 goals and 45 assists in the 1973-74 season. Kent Runke's 51 goals in the 1975-76 season are the most scored by a Blue in a season.

Caines and Farelli are both within reach of these records. To date Caines has a 33-28-61 scoring record while Farelli is right behind with 33-27-60.

Alex Jeans needs only seven more assists to break Pagnutti's single season mark. Rob Gemmell is likely to become the highest single season scoring defenceman in Blues' history.

Before the playoffs begin the Blues will play five more games; against Ottawa and York twice and Queen's once. All games, except one of the York encounters, will be played at Varsity Arena.

If Zorro Could See Them Now

By JIM SCARROW

What comes to mind when fencing is mentioned? How about white tights, and flashing steel, the mark of Zorro, or perhaps farmer's fields.

What makes fencing a sport different from others? Is it different? Why do people fence? What better way to answer these questions than to ask fencers?

Fencers are attracted to the sport for different reason. Jim Cheng, veteran sabre fencer says, "it was the emphasis on skill and coordination as opposed to physical prowess", that appealed to him.

Dave Hamer, long time Epee fencer agreed, "fencing is a thinking sport". Mentioned, of course, was the romanticism attached to fencing. All for one and one for all, and all that.

"But only initially," observed Hamer. "A more scientific, analytical attitude soon follows".

All agreed that aggressiveness was a key factor. Fencing is an individual sport because few actually fence, but more importantly, because you're all alone out on the strip. There is no one but you between defeat and victory. No one to help, no one to blame, but yourself. It is the aggressive desire to achieve that drives the process of deflation and inflation as individuals are defeated or victorious.

Is fencing different from other sports? The difference seems more psychological than real to most fencers.

A down-hill skier faces the same consequences as the fencer; individual victory or defeat. Apart from different apparatus, the strategy of fencing can be compared to many other sports.

Yet it maintains many distinctions in the eyes of the public. "There seems to be a certain mystique about fencing that is not present in other sports" according to Hamer. "Fencing must attract a lot of elitists."

These types rarely last long, however, as the mysticism is replaced by the realities of the sport. By asking what makes a good fencer, the realities became quite apparent. The answer is "practice".

This weekend provides an excellent opportunity to witness this unique sport. On Saturday (Feb. 4) at the main gym of the Benson Building, the O.U.A.A. Fencing Sectionals will be held. These competitors represent some of the best talent Ontario has to offer, including our own U of T fencers.

The Toronto team has a fine record of wins in past meets of this calibre and should provide some expert and exciting competition. The meet starts about 10:00 and will run to about 6:00.

Game Of The Week

By JIM McLEAN

Scarborough College A extended its unbeaten streak to three games with a 1-1 tie with Sr. Engineering in a Monday night game at Varsity Arena. Although the game was plagued with eleven minor penalties, the majority to Scarborough, it did manage to be somewhat interesting. Scoring chances by both teams were in vain because of the fine efforts of the goalies.

The first period opened with some stiff checking as both teams seemed intent on getting the two points. But beginning at the fifteen minute mark, Scarborough was riddled with penalties that may have cost them the game.

The first one came at the fifteen minute mark but was easily handled by Scarborough's penalty-killing unit. The second and third came at an even worse time allowing the Engineers a two-man advantage. But again Scarborough's consistent penalty-killing and secure goaltending prevented an onslaught of Engineering goals.

The Maroons took three more penalties while the Engineers acquired only one to result in a scoreless first period.

End to end play accompanied by matched aggressiveness prevented either team from dominating on the scoreboard or the ice. Scarborough came to realize they weren't going to win the game in the penalty box and drastically reduced their penalty margin without reducing their aggressive offensive.

The second period continued uneventfully until the halfway mark when Scarborough found themselves following the old penalty routine. Four straight minors, two of them doubles should have left Scarborough at a deficit. Engineers however could not seem to put together a complete attack and were either left in their own end or offside.

Scarborough's penalty-killing unit of three defencemen seemed to perform quite efficiently. All three defencemen controlled the Engineers attack by repeatedly dumping the easily acquired puck into the Engineers zone.

At the five minute mark Bruce Stephens collected first star billing from Scarborough by neatly tucking away their goal with a shot from the point.

But Engineers retaliated with the tying goal by Ray Gibso from Ken Krikyiw. This goal may have come sooner if the Engineers made a stronger effort to avoid unnecessary offside.

Nearing the end of the game, Davis Kuksis appeared destined to be Scarborough's next hero but couldn't buy a goal with three open shots on net. Engineers also had their chances but failed to capitalize.

Coaches Lead The Way

By NICK MAROTTA

To explain the rise of U of T's wrestlers from a fifth place finisher five years ago to a challenger for second spot this year you have to look at a number of factors. The most dominant of these is coaching.

Along with head coach Joe Rabel, the Blues possess two experienced assistants in Rob Moore and Clive Llewellyn. Moore and Llewellyn give Rabel immeasurable assistance in improving the technique and confidence of younger wrestlers.

As well as coaching, both of the assistants compete. In the case of Llewellyn, he brings experience which aids the team in many ways.

For instance, if an individual such as Llewellyn consistently wins his matches (which he usually does) it sets the tempo for the rest of the team. Also the presence of Llewellyn has an un-nerving effect on the opposition as he watches for weaknesses which could be exploited by his teammates.

Having an easy going person such as Llewellyn on the team also introduces some levity in practices. Practising in a relaxed atmosphere has positive effects on the team's performance in meets.

Llewellyn feels a second place finish is a realistic goal this year. He points to wrestlers such as Al Tamane, Erik Boss, John Brown, Sam Turchiano and Jack Preobrazenski as reason for this assessment.

Fencing forces competitors to rely on their coordination and aggressiveness for success.

UTSA negotiates for higher salaries

By TOM KUHN

An eight-page brief emphasizing the need for comparability in wages, benefits and working conditions between the academic staff and the administrative staff opened negotiations on salaries and benefits last Tuesday between the U of T Staff Association (UTSA) and the university.

UTSA asked also that the university grant an eight per cent across-the-board pay increase, with a three per cent merit increase to protect administrative staff employees from the effects of inflation.

The UTSA request falls below the rate of inflation, which according to the November 1977 figures issued by Statistics Canada is now running at 9.1 per cent, said Charlotte Turnbull, president of UTSA, in a telephone interview Friday.

The UTSA brief asked for a "joint commission" to be established to develop university-wide policies specifically relating to administrative staff lay-offs for fiscal reasons.

"We have a group very committed to the university. We know we are faced with fiscal cutbacks," said Turnbull. Their concern is with the manner in which staff are laid off for fiscal reasons. Supervisors should fix specific procedures, she added.

Recent developments have led a large number of the administrative staff to conclude that the university administration will make the administrative staff bear the brunt of budget cut-backs, the UTSA brief says.

Last fall the Governing Council of the university approved a formal process through which the U of T

Faculty Association (UTFA) would henceforth negotiate salaries, benefits and working conditions for the academic staff and the librarians.

Proposals arising from this arrangement attempt to introduce a degree of job security for librarians which is far removed from the job insecurity experienced by many of the university's administrative staff, according to the UTSA brief.

The recent budget guidelines distributed by the Budget Office to deans and directors demanded that budgets be prepared on the basis of a three per cent cut-back for academic divisions and a five per cent cut-back for non-academic administrative (staff) divisions.

This "over-simplified" distinction between academic and non-academic divisions has reinforced the fears of their members, the UTSA brief says.

"We have no indication they (the university administration) will treat us differently from anyone else," emphasized Turnbull. The administration is not going to sacrifice one group against the other, she said. "The faculty association and ourselves are watching for any attempt to pit one against the other," said Turnbull.

UTSA is now an amorphous group. The membership is not interested in unionization. "Whether we go into a more formalized association depends on the discussions with the administration," she said.

The failure on the part of the university administration to recognize the unease among the administrative staff will inevitably lead to a polarization within the university, the brief warns.

INI 213 cut, others may follow

By GEORGE COOK

The axe has all but fallen on Innis College's Independent Studies program.

The Committee on Academic Standards of the Faculty of Arts and Science decided last Friday to discontinue INI 213, a second-year independent studies option and to require that all projects for independent study at Innis be approved each spring by a college committee made up primarily of full-time faculty members. The decision must go before Governing Council for final approval.

The faculty will institute "a system whereby most projects will be supervised by one, or more than one specialist in the field," according to Arts and Science Dean Arthur Kruger, chairman of the Committee on Academic Standards.

"It means that there is no need for permanent standing resource people in this program," Kruger said. He added, however, that permanent people may be hired if needed.

Kruger said there was no reason why the number of students in Independent Studies at Innis shouldn't grow. Innis College Principal William Saywell stated last week, however, that these changes will mean "a lower number of students (taking Independent Studies, but to what degree the numbers would drop, I don't know," (Varsity, Feb. 1, 1978).

Independent Studies now consists of five part-time resources people supervising a large number of projects. There are currently 110 people in the program.

Wendy Donner, co-ordinator of the program and one of the five part-time resource staff, was displeased by the decision. "The university can't simply hatchet innovative courses like this without people trying to do something about it," she said.

Donner said she was "astounded that the committee didn't defer the decision given that the college itself is doing a review of the program."

She added that she and other part-time faculty members are considering grievance procedures against the university.

"It astounds me that people teaching at the university for several years could be released in this way," she stated.

Howard Eisenberg, another resource staff member, said he thought the university was using the budgetary crisis as "a convenient excuse" to cut back "innovative programs that challenge the status quo."

Members of the part-time faculty at Innis, including Donner and Eisenberg, have formed the Ad Hoc Committee to oppose Innis College cutbacks. Several students have joined them.

The committee, which will meet again Friday, will circulate petitions across the campus opposing the cutting of Innis programs and teachers. They will also research a document on the cutbacks at Innis to back their demands and challenge the administration's reason — lack of academic credibility — for eliminating the Innis courses.

Howard Kwan (Innis II) member of the faculty committee on college courses (the body, chaired by Kruger, that made the initial recommendation to the Committee on Academic Standards that Independent Studies be altered), said the Innis College Council's position on Independent Studies carried no weight with the committee on college courses.

"All kinds of letters and testimonials were sent in, but they were hardly read," he stated. Kwan said he thought Innis College Principal Saywell's position against the retention of part-time resource people hurt the council's position.

Kwan said he believed the position paper presented to the committee on college courses by the Innis College Student Society (ICSS) hurt the chances of saving the program. "We (at the Innis council) were impressed that the students came up

One of 13 goals scored by the Blues Friday night. See page 12 for details.

"Forces will be created which cannot be controlled by the university administration or by the U of T Staff Association," it concludes.

The administration will examine various cost-accounting aspects of the UTSA recommendations before negotiations resume in about a week.

Victory for Cassidy

By JOE BOLGER

Mike Cassidy of Ottawa Centre emerged victorious over Ian Deans (Hamilton Wentworth) in the provincial NDP leadership candidacy this weekend at the Sheraton Centre. Cassidy's victory came on the second ballot in which he tallied 980 votes to the 809 votes for Deans. Michael Breagh, the third candidate for the leadership position, was eliminated after the first ballot.

Cassidy, a former financial journalist and university professor, relied heavily on what he called "grass roots support" for the victory. It was thought by some that a lack of support from the party caucus would take away greatly from Cassidy's chances. However, his ability to summon support from youth, community activists, riding associations and academics more than compensated for this alleged deficit.

In his speech prior to the balloting, Cassidy attacked the PCs for their handling of the provincial economy. The 300,000 unemployed across the province, he asserted, stand as proof that the free enterprise system isn't working.

Possibly more than the other candidates, Cassidy directed his comments more specifically to questions concerning the economy, criticizing government positions with regard to the handling of natural resources and excessive foreign ownership.

Relating these thoughts to the social realm, he asserted that "a strong economy is essential to sustain a humane society in Ontario."

In a press conference following the traditional acceptance speech, Cassidy pointed out that two priorities for the party had come out of the weekend conference: the provincial economy and national unity. He felt that the party would direct a large amount of its effort towards these particular causes in the future.

Freedom of info versus privacy

By CAROLINE CONNELL

The reconciliation of freedom of information with individual privacy cannot be achieved in terms of absolute answers — any solutions will have to be flexible and subject to interpretation, panelists at the conference on law and contemporary affairs agreed Friday.

Keynote speaker The Honourable James McRuer QC stressed the need for an intelligent and flexible balance between these two conflicting interests. He cited contrasting examples to demonstrate how under certain circumstances either principle could take priority over the other. He warned, however, that any course of action in this area should be carefully examined for its potential danger to individual freedom.

Panelist John Reid MP outlined some aspects of the new Human Rights Act which comes into effect March 1. The act will allow a citizen access to any government files on him. He stated, though, that legislation in the area of human rights can never provide a complete answer, and that the problem lies within human nature as well as government bureaucracy. Reid stressed the need for all levels of government to be less free with the use of "Secret" stamps, which are now almost a matter of routine in some cases.

Panelist Gerald Baldwin MP continued this theme: The lifeblood of democratic government is public access to government decision-making, which is now being severely threatened by excessive classification of information. He said that the public must be provided with the tools to challenge governmental authority, but pointed out the difficulties presented when the information in question involves personal privacy.

Mark Lynch, counsel to the American Civil Liberties Union, argued, however, that instances of government release of information causing harm to individuals are extremely rare. Therefore, he continued, government restrictions on secret information need not be as tight as they are now. This gives rise to the need for an independent arbiter to determine when the classification of information is valid. In the United States this role is filled by the courts, and Lynch would like to see a parallel system in Canada.

All panelists agreed that there is a need for freer release of information by government to give the public access to the decision-making so essential in a democratic system. Legislation reconciling this to the need for individual privacy must be careful and balanced, they concluded.

Bury our nuclear wastes, prof advises gov't

By ARTHUR ROTENBERG

"I came through the Second World War. To me, taking the bomb and turning it into a useful civilian technology was like turning a sword into a plowshare. Most of my generation in that sense are pro-nuclear." These were the words of Kenneth Hare, Director of the Institute for Environmental Studies, during an interview last Thursday.

Hare is currently in a controversial position following the publication of his study on nuclear waste management last November. In the study, Hare recommended that a research program be launched immediately to learn how to dispose of the radioactive wastes accumulating at nuclear generating stations in Ontario. He suggested that the material be disposed of in deep, hard rock repositories. However, he did not consider the problem severe enough to restrain currently planned expansion of the nuclear industry.

In January, Hare was cross-examined on the contents of his study by the Porter Commission, a Royal Commission with a mandate to investigate the future of electric power planning in Ontario. Speaking on the terms of reference of his report, Hare said, "We are accepting the fact that this country is committed to a nuclear program... and that it is planned to expand." Gordon Edwards, a prominent critic of nuclear development, then asked if the report was simply a political document designed to reinforce the government's position. During the Varsity interview, Hare said he would not have agreed to write the report if he had not been permitted to write what he believed.

Edwards also suggested that Hare's report had avoided the most difficult questions about nuclear power, such as security and health hazards, in order to satisfy the public about the most straightforward questions. Hare claimed he had dealt with those questions within the framework handed to him by the government. Hare admitted to the Varsity that mining wastes like those at Elliot Lake create a much more expensive problem, but said, "oddly enough, it is not the one that has had public visibility." He pointed out, however, that the government had only requested a study of wastes produced by the reactors, not mining wastes.

The Porter Commission also questioned whether Hare was presenting personal opinion or objective information. Hare pointed out that since he is dealing with hypothetical situations (such as the danger that would result if someone blew up a reactor bay), there is no such thing as objective information. He also said, "It is a very difficult thing to exclude one's personal views in the writing of a document of this kind."

The power of public opinion is a major factor in nuclear development. In a telephone interview, Peter Mueller of the Porter Commission pointed out that the waste management problem has "grabbed the public imagination because of the very long time frame." Hare believes that "maximum credibility in society remains with the scientific community" and that scientists are therefore best suited to inform the public on the matter of nuclear waste. When asked if the purpose of his report was to straighten out public opinion, he replied, "We were told there was mounting public uncertainty about what should be done and that it was essential that there be a public debate about it—that the public be made to understand."

In his report, Hare claimed it would take 15 years to find and test a suitable waste disposal site in Ontario. In the interim, wastes are stored in large water-filled pools on the surface. Mueller said, "I suspect we could do it in five years if the government cracked down and said, 'No more reactors until the waste problem is solved.'" He pointed out that the Swedish government has taken this stand, and that the Swedes are apparently making much faster progress.

Hare told the Varsity that the problem could not be solved much faster even if more money was put in because the rock tests required take so much time.

'Jews are victims of double loyalty charge'

By DAVID YANOWSKI

"To whom else is the double loyalty charge ever applied, except to the Jewish people?" said U of T Professor Emil Fackenheim at last Wednesday's Symposium on Zionism.

Speaking before an overflowing audience Fackenheim said that his talk was not concerned with the "antisemitic criminal who seeks the death of all Jews," but with "the democratic friend of the Jew who condemns him for willfully considering himself a Jew."

He said this view originated during the enlightenment and the French Revolution, where it was declared: "To the Jews as men we give everything. To the Jews as Jews we give nothing." Fackenheim further related that during the Second World War a conference was held in Bermuda to see what could be done about saving Jewish lives. The democratic friends who gathered could not see any reason in saving the people who had produced Freud and Einstein, he said.

"Once again, the dual loyalty charge can be heard," Fackenheim went on to say. "But this time it is said in relation to Israel." He stated that "no one asks a Protestant who he would save, given the choice of saving a Canadian or another Protestant. While the Jews are expected to be universal, the dual loyalty charge has been directed only at them." Fackenheim charged. On the right Jews found it necessary to be 150 percent nationalist, he said, while on the left they felt that they should "lead the fight to universalism."

Fackenheim related the story of Rosa Luxemburg, a Polish Jewish woman who became the leader of the German Socialist movement. During one of her frequent arrests she wrote a letter to a Zionist friend, describing in poetic language the suffering of the Zulus and Bantus. She urged her friend to forget about the Jews and worry about the rest of mankind. Twenty-five years later every Jew in her village had been murdered, but the Zulus and Bantus were still alive, he said.

Fackenheim said that during the war the democratic friends of the Jew said they couldn't help Jews now; they had a war to fight. The moment the war was over they urged the Jew to forget the holocaust. What really made the difference for Jews today was not the holocaust, but the state of Israel, said Fackenheim. If it was not for Israel Hiller would have won a posthumous victory, he asserted.

Fackenheim related how at Bergen-Belsen a memorial to the holocaust was set up in all different languages except Hebrew and Yiddish. "They were murdered as Jews, but the world wants to remember them as Poles, Lithuanians and Hungarians." Enough protest forced the authorities to change the memorial to one that included Hebrew and Yiddish, he said.

The government has a responsibility to protect the weak against the strong, Gregory Baum, U of T Professor of Theology, told a capacity audience at a conference on law and contemporary affairs Friday.

Hate literature should be censored according to whom it is directed at, Baum said. Material involving WASPs or Jews should not be censored, he explained, because such groups are "strong, influential and able to protect themselves." However, hate literature against Pakistanis should be censored, he said, because this group is not well established in Ontario.

Baum also advocates censorship for pornography because "the sex industry is strong, and the public is weak."

Morris Manning, a Toronto attorney, disagreed with Baum's approach to civil liberties, stating "I would prefer to define civil liberties in terms of the protection of privacy."

Manning said the problem of censorship is "where you draw the line" between the right of the individual to do what he wants, and

The shimmer of television lights turned the Grand Ballroom at the Sheraton Centre, site of the New Democratic Party leadership convention, into a crystal palace. The crown prince of the ball turned out to be the Cinderella candidate, Michael Cassidy.

The leadership contest was not influenced so much by the candidates' stands on the issues as it was a battle of personalities. There was the serious Ian Deans, the forceful, fiery Michael Cassidy, and jovial Michael Breaugh.

It was Deans' campaign style that turned a lot of delegate's votes in Michael Cassidy's direction.

Cheryl Sheff, a delegate from Cochrane, Ontario, was upset by a Deans demonstration, on the Saturday night before the balloting, that included a Scottish pipe band. "It was like an American presidential convention. That's not the way the NDP is, and the demonstration with the pipe bands made the convention look cheap," she said.

She had been a Breaugh supporter who would have voted for Deans on a second ballot, but the sound of the pipes sent her to Cassidy.

Saturday night a dance was held in former NDP leader Stephen Lewis' honor. Delegates turned out for the ball fashionably attired. It was not the kind of social affair the party could hold in an arena, a delegate commented. Many delegates were vocal about how unhappy they were about paying hotel prices for drinks.

The NDP had to hold their convention at the Sheraton because, with 1,789 delegates, they had no choice but to give up the tradition of holding it in arenas. The convention that picked Stephen Lewis as leader in 1970 was a third smaller.

The convention was docile until on the first ballot Cassidy, a former Varsity editor, garnered more votes than Deans, the expected winner.

When the doors to the Grand Ballroom were sealed for the second ballot, two Deans supporters caught outside the room forced their way through closed doors and past ushers to be able to cast their ballots. Meanwhile, confident Michael Cassidy started to write his acceptance speech while the second set of ballots were being counted.

After the second and winning ballot, Deans went to the podium to call for unanimous support for Cassidy and then disappeared into the crowd.

the right of a society to protect itself. However, he warned, "the right to privacy is the very bedrock of democratic society," and that "we've got to be vigilant against those who want to bring us back to the Middle Ages."

"I'm surprised Mr. Manning suggests that I want to go back to the Middle Ages. I'd be satisfied with 15 years," responded Walter Berns. According to Berns, a U of T professor of Political Science, the connection between private morality and the public order has been decided on in our society, and the pornography have son. Now there is no connection, he stated.

"Years ago, censors tried to make us ashamed to read Penthouse magazine," he said. "Things have changed. There is no longer any shame connected with the pornography industry, either with selling or reading pornography."

Berns cited an invitation to Penthouse magazine publisher Bob Guccione to speak at the conference as evidence that attitudes toward pornography have changed.

"Years ago, no one would have recognized such a man's name." He added that now, if Xaviera Hollander had been invited to the conference, the audience would fill Convocation Hall.

Berns charged that if pornographers have won, then liberal democracy has lost. Self-government depends on a people able to govern itself, and for this to happen there must be a limit on what can be openly sold and enjoyed, he said. He went on to say that making sex public destroys certain human qualities, such as "modesty, delicateness, fidelity, abstinence, chastity and shame." Censorship laws are important because "law can affect behaviour in an indirect fashion by prescribing and proscribing certain kinds of behaviour."

Kathy Keaton, associate publisher of Penthouse magazine and editor of Viva magazine, who was present in Guccione's place, found it curious that morality is always translated into sexual morality. She asked whether it is not more immoral to do things that destroy our planet, like environmental pollution.

Keaton denied Baum's statement that the sex industry is strong and should therefore be censored. "Our organization (Penthouse) is very weak compared to the Catholic Church," she said.

Keaton was aware that the public's attitude towards pornography is changing. "Times have indeed changed, and I applaud that change," she commented. As for stricter censorship laws, "I'd be sorry to see any country move towards a totalitarian state."

TORONTO (CP) — A corporal in the Canadian Armed Forces told a court martial Thursday at Canadian Forces base Downsview he would not have sent artillery shells to Canada from Somalia, Egypt, as souvenirs if he had known they were dangerous.

FIGHTING BACK!

Innis College has given birth to a group that holds hope for the future — an ad hoc committee to fight cutbacks at the college and university.

The task facing them is not an easy one; cutbacks are a province-wide phenomenon. At York University, for example, the outgoing dean of the Faculty of Arts has said there will be a drastic reduction of part-time teaching staff. At Ryerson the president of the institute has announced that because of "budgetary restraint" they may have to eliminate the equivalent of 88 full-time teaching jobs next year.

For students everywhere this means larger classes and less access to professors.

On Friday the pattern repeated itself at Innis College. A committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science decided to axe Innis's Independent Studies program. This will almost certainly result in the termination, at the end of the current academic year of five part-time resource people. Enrolment in Independent Studies at Innis will be reduced next year.

These cutbacks should come as no surprise. They are part of a campaign devised and controlled by Queen's Park and executed by their administrators at the universities. The technique is simple. To reduce the cost of education to the province make education harder to get, and make it more expensive for students, those who can least afford it. The economy, Davis says, can no longer "absorb" us, so his government decides, quite summarily, to reduce our numbers.

Neither our university administration, nor any other in the province, can be expected to fight cutbacks. U of T's bureaucrats have publicly accepted the premise that there must be cuts in education spending and that we, the students, and non-academic or part-time staff, must simply make do. They are, after all, hirings of the province. Davis shoots, they dance; it's that simple.

If cutbacks are to be opposed it's up to students and their allies to do it.

Such an effort is now underway at Innis where part-time faculty, along with students, faced with an administration that has proved intractable in its neglect of their desires, have formed this committee to fight cutbacks. We laud their efforts.

Although the committee is in its early stages it is a promising sign that those for whom this university exists — the students and their supporters — will not sit quietly by while an arrogant government and its university administration ride roughshod over their interests.

Hubie dead at last

In a letter to last Wednesday's Varsity, a member of the Varsity staff, one Sean Dunphy, penned his words of revulsion and disgust for a Workers Vanguard headline — "Humphrey Dead at Last." Evidently Dunphy finds it in "disgustingly poor taste" and "childish" that Workers Vanguard, unlike mass murderer and war criminal, Richard Milhouse Nixon, did not pay its last respects to the corpse of this vicious anti-communist and sworn enemy of the working people from the U.S. to Vietnam.

By way of response we of the Trotskyist League (who as Dunphy puts it "hawk" Workers Vanguard in the lobby of Sid Smith) write not to soothe any offended sensibilities but to uphold the Workers Vanguard headline and article which records the history of the "Happy Warrior" from a proletarian revolutionary perspective. Let the bourgeoisie and its media servants pour out eulogies memorializing Humphrey as the "friend of the little guy" and "man of the people." For our part, as working-class revolutionaries we have quite a different story to tell of this strike-breaking, war-mongering, cold warrior.

We remember him as the anti-Communist mayor of Minneapolis who drove the "reds" out of the Democratic Farmer-Labor Party (DFL) and the labor movement. We don't forget that he sponsored the 1954 Communist Control Act outlawing the Communist Party nor that he amended the 1950 McCarron Act to set up concentration camps for "subversives" in the U.S. Our "memorial" to this left-over New Dealer records his crimes against the working class — his calls for strengthening the anti-union Taft-Hartley Act, his hatchet job on the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party and above all, his role as a major proponent and leader of U.S. imperialism's sanguinary colonial war against Vietnam.

For this we can only stand proudly condemned by Dunphy who protests that the death of Hubert Humphrey should not be shown such disrespect, "regardless of Humphrey's stand on the Viet Nam War." Doubtless the workers and peasants of Vietnam against whom Humphrey waged hellish war for American imperialism would not share these "noble" sentiments. As the article points out, had "Hubie", as he is so fondly remembered by the U.S. ruling class, been shot down over Vietnam it would have been a poetic death, a well deserved end for this rabid anti-communist.

But Humphrey's death was anything but poetic and if Dunphy is looking for "poor taste" he need look no further than the man himself. In fact, Humphrey's perverse exploitation of his fatal illness was beneath bad taste. The whole macabre affair accompanying his drawn-out death rattle, including living color shots of his death mask profile plastered on television screens and the endless testimonial dinners at which Humphrey wheeled in his decaying remains, were simply obscene.

Humphrey is dead — at last — and we shed no tears for his passing. But strikebreaking, witchhunting, false "friends of labor" live on. It will be the task of a victorious working class revolution led by a Trotskyist vanguard party to bury Humphrey and all that he represents.

SAC V-P invalid

We applaud Governing Council Chief Returning Officer, Ross Smith, for his actions concerning Mr. David Jones' nomination papers for Governing Council. We feel that any valid nominee would not procrastinate to the last possible moment, the submission of these important papers. Any organized person would surely have attended to this matter before leaving town. Perhaps the students of the University of Toronto should take this as a sign of Mr. Jones' attitudes towards the position he is attempting to obtain in the Governing Council. Furthermore, it is gratifying to see that Mr. Smith would not give Mr. Jones any preferential treatment simply because he is the Vice-President of SAC. We hope that this decision is upheld by the Election Advisory Committee.

Why not English?

I would like to relate a recent incident which I'm sure has been shared by many U of T students. While attempting to do research on a 19th century German King I was distressed to find that Sig Sam was totally lacking adequate information. This forced me to turn to that vast storehouse of knowledge known as the Robarts library. There I was pleased to find a very large section on German history. Unfortunately, my knowledge of the German language is totally derived from watching Hogan's Heroes and hence I was unable to read the books on hand. An essay on Tokyo was similarly thwarted because (believe it or not) I speak even less Japanese. I have a passable knowledge of French but one can only write so many essays about France.

I do not, however, question the policy of the libraries of purchasing foreign language books. After all they are less expensive in their original form than the English translations would be. Buying books that 95 per cent of the students cannot read not only reduces the temptation to steal these books but it also cuts down on excessive wear and tear (mind you they do tend to get rather dusty).

As a geography major and a history minor I hate to limit my field of knowledge to the U.S., Great Britain and Canada. I do not believe however, that it should be necessary for me to learn another language everytime I wish to do research on a non-English speaking country.

There have been many complaints recently about the lack of English proficiency among U of T students. Perhaps if we had more exposure to English language books on campus it would improve our grasp of the language.

As Toronto is a cosmopolitan community, I have no objection to filling our libraries with foreign language material. I just think it would be nice for us students who are not fluent in 12 different languages if we could occasionally find a book in Robarts in our native tongue.

Vic athletes

On the front page of the Varsity (Monday 30th, Jan.) Craig Wardlaw, the VCAU vice-president, was reported to have said that he had heard no complaints about the VCAU. As the curator of Vic's water polo team, I wish to make it known that the VCAU has not attempted to contact me, or call a meeting of all the team curators. I have also been trying unsuccessfully to get in touch with Bob Isles for the past two weeks. So if Craig Wardlaw has heard no complaints about the VCAU, maybe it is due to a lack of communication between VCAU and the male student body of Vic.

Editur Needud

The Varsity Committee invites applications for the position of The Varsity Editor-in-chief for the 1978-79 publishing year.

As well as resumes of work experience and educational background applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the format, editorial policy, internal structure or aspects of production. The editor will have to work with a large staff — currently numbering approximately 100 members — in devising and implementing these changes. Candidates may suggest names for the other editorial positions. The amount available for production staff this year is $16,730 including a weekly stipend of $155 for the editor-in-chief. The editor generally works a fifty to eighty hour week.

Applicants will be interviewed by both the Varsity staff and the Varsity Committee. The staff shall select its choice in an election — the successful candidate must obtain 50 per cent plus one of the votes cast — and the Committee will then consider ratification of the staff choice. The editor may be removed from his position only by concurrent decision of the Varsity staff and the Varsity Committee.

Address written applications to:

English proficiency: good as ever

In two years U of T students will likely be required to pass a test of English proficiency in order to continue at the university. The Varsity is taking up investigation into proficiency testing, including the experience of students at other universities and colleges where such testing has been instituted.

The University of Waterloo began experimental testing in 1975. The next year the tests became compulsory with optional follow-up clinics. This year UW made passing the test a requirement for graduation for all Arts students. Clinics are mandatory for those who fail. In September 44 percent of Arts students flunked the test.

We are printing here excerpts from an article written by Don Martin, a student supervisor in the program at Waterloo. His report originally appeared in the chevron:

People have been lamenting the decline of writing skills for so long it's remarkable that students can still sign their names.

In fact it's arguable that proficiency testing over the years indicates students are getting better at writing, because 27 years ago 65 percent of the students who wrote a proficiency exam at the University of Toronto flunked it, whereas last year only 44 percent of Waterloo students blew the exam. (Ed.'s note: Less than 50 percent flunked at Erindale.)

At any rate, the clamour that went on in the press, first in the U.S. then in Canada, brought about a lot of proficiency exams administered by a lot of universities. At Waterloo the first such test was actually administered in 1975 by a team of researchers working for the Ontario Government but the results were not released at that time.

During the summer of '76 eight tutors were "carefully selected on the basis of their educational background and experience," and on September 14th 800 bewildered arts frosh and two Kitchener-Waterloo Record reporters were herded into the gym, were given fifty minutes to write on "How to put on a coat", and were told to answer 106 multiple choice questions in 45 minutes. Surprise. Surprise. 314 Arts frosh and 1 Record reporter blew it.

The results of the hastily conceived and developed programme seemed to confirm the common belief that students don't write so hot. The judgments of high school teachers, made over at least a term (as reflected in grade 13 English grades), were set aside in favour of the results obtained from a single, mass-administered exam. But what about the all-Ontario study funded by the government and released last January under the impressive name Secondary-Post-Secondary Interface Study?

From page 313 of Project II, Volume I, The Nature of Students:

Given available evidence from the past, back as far as 1956 when the departmental examination system was in full force, it is clear that teachers' marks in 1976 are as good a source of evidence on potential university achievements as the departmental examination results were, and as teachers' marks were, in the years immediately following the discontinuing of the departmental examinations.

Essentially the same statement is repeated in the Summary Report on pages 74-75. On page 109 the Summary remarks that public criticism of both secondary and post-secondary education has gone on for centuries. On pages 125-130 the Summary states that there is no "golden era" of the past and maintains:

There is strong evidence that the group of students passing through the interface between secondary and post-secondary studies is as well educated and as well prepared in basic skills as were similar groups in Ontario in the past and as are comparable groups of students in other countries.

It seems wrong, doesn't it, that a university, of all places, should act so hastily on disputed evidence in a matter that affects real people (you) so profoundly. Not only is the evidence disputed by respectable research, but it isn't even clear that the programme is beneficial.

Re-testing was done on such a small number (and that number was made up of students who felt confident enough to rewrite the exam), that absolutely nothing can be determined.

But there it is — extra non-credit work hours, loaded onto those students who, if the testing means anything at all, most need time for course studies.

Does the Proficiency Programme encourage you as students? Is it designed to help you at university? Anyone who thinks at all must agree that forcing an exam onto new students on their first day at school and casting doubts on the validity of their high school work is a discouragement.

Further, the action is clearly contrary to the recommendations made by the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA) in their June 1977 brief to the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA).

In that brief they point out that various studies and reports on the matter warrant no firm conclusions and that the incomplete and anecdotal evidence that is available does not constitute a good basis for policy-making.

It would in our view be premature, and probably unfair to many potential university students, to suppose that there are grave deficiencies in current secondary school curricula or in university admission standards. (page 22)

Both the OCUFA brief and the actual OCUA annual report recognize that "it is important to distinguish between changes in academic standards that might occur for academic reasons and those that flow in the wake of enrolment numbers that approach system capacity." (OCUA page 14.) It is precisely this distinction which the Proficiency Programme fails to make since the academic assumptions on which it is based are of dubious validity, to say the least, and the certain discouragement which it provides (especially to those who come from homes where middle class English is not the norm) can be seen to serve the ends of bureaucrats confronted with incentives to curtail growth and, in fact, incentives to decrease the number of students.

Some of you already confronted with the other aspects of education cutbacks — increasing tuition, less professor time, greater student debt — will find that changing standards and the increased work load will make your new life at university less pleasant than it might have been.

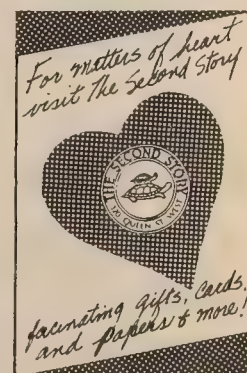

Those of you who depend on part-time work to stay in school may find that the hours taken from your schedule will make life downright impoverished.

Others, who pass the exam easily, will be relatively little affected by the programme: but if all of you unite to oppose the cutbacks, this attack on students can be turned.

Profs attack tests

VANCOUVER (CUP) — An English exam which about 40 percent of first-year University of B.C. students "failed" has drawn fire from English professors.

"I haven't come across any profs who liked it," said one highly-placed source in the university's English department. "It was a very bad exam altogether. It was much too difficult. The exam was not written in good English and the passage was overblown and overcomplex," he said.

The failure rate for the exam, written in December, was in the 40 percent range, although no exact figure has been released as appeals are still being considered. Last year, the failure rate was 37 percent.

One English professor charged that: "The purpose of the exam is simply to produce a certain number of failures." He added that the exam should be abolished, and said it is written in a high-pressure, panic situation and uses the most "nit-picking" methods to separate the student's writing from the thought process.

Another professor complained that grading of the exam is "incredibly erratic". He also suggested that students who wrote strong interpretive essays with grammatical errors may have failed, while students with correct grammar but mediocre essays passed the exam.

The U of T Press:

Scholarly works - financial h

By Peter Hohenadel

On January 30th, 1902, the Board of Trustees of the University of Toronto recommended the purchase of a Linotype machine so that "the press work of the examination papers and class lists together with the composition of the calendar could all be done at the University." The cost of this operation "will not exceed $1,000" according to the minutes of that meeting.

The University of Toronto Press has come a long way in the seventy-five years since that meeting. With more than 1,200 titles in its publications backlog and total sales exceeding $12 million from all its divisions, the U of T Press has director of the U of T Press, its most important function is the publication of scholarly works. "That's our entire raison d'être," Bohne said in a recent interview. "There would be no reason to have a university press if it were not for our role in the dissemination of Canadian scholarship."

Because of the esoteric nature of these scholarly works, the U of T Press faces many special problems in its task of scholarly publication. The Press receives some 800 manuscripts annually, many of which require appraisal from experts in each academic field. This painstaking process often results in project is being published simultaneously in English and French.

Other projects at U of T Press concern the particular interest of groups of scholars at the University of Toronto. For example, the Collected Works of Erasmus and John Stuart Mill are both being assembled at U of T Press, with the help of local scholars. These exhaustive compilations are essential to the preservation of the prolific and widely scattered works of these two philosophers.

Although the U of T Press maintains a naturally close relationship with U of T scholars, consideration of scholarly works for publication is by no means limited to the faculty at U of T. However, U of established an international reputation as one of the top five university presses in North America.

A slowly spinning circular table is used for manual collating at the 1902 - "not to exceed $1,000"

The duties of the Press have extended far beyond its original mandate. The U of T Press is responsible for the administration of campus bookstores, as well as the distribution of Media Centre productions. Publication of current and popular books such as the three volumes of Lester Pearson's autobiography, Mike, and the best-selling collections of the photographs of Yousuf Karsh are an increasing source of revenue and acclaim for the Press.

But according to Harald Bohne, a manuscript being rejected. The Press employs five senior editors to supervise the selection and preparation of manuscripts for the printers.

The Largest Canadian Press

From this flood of manuscripts, the Press publishes approximately 80 works each year, as well as continuing their research on special long-term projects such as the Dictionary of Canadian Biography. This Dictionary was initiated in 1959, "to provide full and authoritative biographies of every noteworthy Canadian from the earliest time of historical record." This immense

T Press does give preference to research done in Canada on topics of national interest. Director Bohne pointed out that foreign manuscripts are not excluded from the Press's consideration.

As the largest university press in Canada, the U of T Press has a certain obligation to other Canadian universities. Scholars from all over Canada look to U of T Press as the only likely publisher for their obscure but nonetheless essential scholarly works. According to Bohne, many scholars submit doctoral theses for publication. These are often found to be unsuitable for publication, because of their specialization or because too much work is required for the theses to be expanded into book form. In order to enlighten scholars about these specific problems, the U of T Press publishes a scholarly journal entitled "Scholarly Publishing". From its pages, the Press has recently compiled a collection of articles entitled The Thesis and the Book. The U of T Press publishes fifteen other scholarly journals on a regular basis, but prints many more special editions.

The financial problems of scholarly publishing cannot be easily ignored. Press runs of 2,000 copies for a scholarly work represent the maximum publication on first run. According to Bohne, the first run is now commonly being reduced to 1,500 copies, because libraries with reduced budgets can no longer afford to purchase some of the Press's more esoteric works. In addition, special printing costs incurred from the assembly of complex scientific texts and illustrated manuals add to the already steep cost of scholarly publication.

Financial Burden

In light of these particular

1978 - sal

problems and the exhaustive editing process, it is no surprise that scholarly publication is an important financial burden for U of T Press. The problem of financial support is becoming increasingly acute.

With regard to the problem of financial support, Director Bohne said, "Any scholarly program needs to be heavily subsidized." Until recently, the major source of support for scholarly publishing has come from foundations committed to the support of the Arts. In Canada,

U of T Press modernizes

By PETER HOHENADEL

By 1966, the burgeoning press plants and offices of the U of T Press had spread over four separate buildings on the crowded St. George campus. Problems of space and co-ordination began to affect the Press's efficiency. The Press solved its problems in one stroke with the purchase of an industrial site at the corner of Steeles and Dufferin in Downsview, at the northern limits of Toronto.

In July of 1966, three-quarters of the Press staff moved to Downsview, including all of the presses, and the accounting and order departments. Their new home was a plant covering 60,000 square feet, with plenty of room for expansion.

In 1978, the Downsview office of U of T Press employs more than 150 people working on two shifts. The Press's move to the suburbs has coincided with their push for modern methods of typesetting and printing. Traditional linotype and hot lead methods of typesetting and printing have now been almost totally replaced by computerized typesetting and offset printing.

The main thrust of the automation process has been in the typesetting stage of printing, according to Ken Allen, Printing Co-ordinator at the Downsview plant. Allen explained that despite the cost of the new equipment, the computerized typesetting machines, which do much of the operator's traditional work such as hyphenation and paragraphing, have already earned their keep by virtue of the significant amounts of time that are saved in each operation. Typical of the speed of the new equipment is the Mergenthaler VIP Typesetter, which can type 30 to 40 characters per second.

The modernization process has not had a serious effect on the employees of the Downsview plant. "We've never laid anyone off because of automation," Allen said. The plant staff has been slightly reduced through attrition. Six operators trained in the old system of typesetting are still employed at the plant to set complex technical works.

The next step of technological progress at the Downsview plant will be the replacement of the presses, according to Allen. The Press maintains a variety of small, older presses for the short printing runs the Press usually undertakes. But the printing staff is anticipating the arrival of a large new press in the spring that promises to revolutionize printing speeds within U of T Press. The new addition to the Press's technology will be the Miller Perfecter, a press more than twice the size of any that the U of T Press now operates. This press will print 64 pages (32 pages printed on both sides) for a six by nine book in a single run. At present, the maximum capacity of the largest press is 16 pages (printed on one side) in a single run.

Obviously, change is the key word at the Downsview plant of U of T Press. The Press has had to match the technological innovations that other commercial presses have made in the last decade. Printing Co-ordinator Ken Allen is confident that the conversion to offset and computerized typesetting will ensure the continued success of U of T Press. "The work is being done faster and cheaper (with the new equipment)," Allen said. "In order to stay competitive, we've had to change."

Linotype machines disappear as computerized offset printing is used.

the two research councils of the Canada Council have generously supported U of T Press. However, according to Bohne, Canada Council's budget was only increased by 3 per cent this year. The U of T Press cannot expect the Canada Council to continue the extent of its support for the rapidly rising costs of book publishing. Grants from the Ford and Mellon Foundations have also provided subsidization for the Press.

Despite these grants, the total financial support "is not nearly enough" to offset the cost of scholarly publication, according to Bohne. The Press must increasingly rely on the profits made by the Printing and Publication Divisions towards a 5 per cent reduction in its budget for the coming year.

Director Bohne emphasized the difficulty any press has in trying to reduce its budget. These problems are particularly acute in the realm of scholarly publishing. However, in its efforts to minimize costs, the U of T Press has attempted to streamline the administration of the Press. Innovations such as publishing books without dust covers and reductions in travel expenses have provided savings for the Press. Although scholars complain about the time required to edit and print scholarly works, faster publishing means higher labour costs. According to Bohne, this budget restraint is likely to mean even longer intervals between the acceptance of a manuscript and its publication.

The U of T Press has been questioned about the payment of royalties to the authors of scholarly works. According to Bohne, authors of subsidized books receive 10 per cent of the net income from the book's sales. Popular authors most commonly receive 10-20 per cent of the list price of their book. Bohne added that although the royalties may not be great (because of the small press runs), they do act as an incentive for the author.

Bookstores too

The inclusion of the University's bookstores under the umbrella of U of T Press does not represent a source of additional income for the Press. According to Bohne, these services are managed by the Press in order to better share the accounting and data processing services of the Press, Bohne said. "Our actual net cost would be considerably higher," if the business affairs of these bodies were managed independently, as would the cost incurred to the university.

les of $12 million of the Press. However, "even (popular) book publication is not as profitable as it was," Bohne said. As a result of representations to the Budget Committee, the U of T Press received a $100,000 subvention from the University of Toronto for the first time last year, for the support of its scholarly publishing program. This grant did not have the unanimous support of Governing Council, and further subsidization from the University does not seem likely. In fact, Governing Council has told U of T Press to work

For this reason, the Press Board rejected a proposal by the Bissell Commission in 1975 that control of the bookstores be turned over to the University, so that the Press could devote its energy to publication.

The U of T Press is responsible for important policy decisions affecting campus bookstores. For example, Bohne explained the reasons behind the discontinuation of the discount system. With a deficit accumulating on the five million dollar annual sales of the bookstores, the Press was faced with the decision of either abolishing the discount system or eliminating the interest-free charge accounts for U of T students. In consultation with students, the Press decided that the charge account system was more important than the discount. In order to decrease the bookstore's deficit, the discount was accordingly dropped.

A book distribution agency in England recently taken over from the Canadian government "will give the Press a larger sales base," and enhance its international distribution, according to Bohne. With some financial support from the federal government, the Press maintains this special service abroad for its own publications and those of other Canadian publishers, perseverance of scholarly publishing in Canada.

More Funding Needed

To this end, Bohne is convinced that the University will have to increase its support of the Press in the future, whether this be in the form of an endowment or subsidy, or in the form of interest-free loans. Bohne pointed out that of a total cost of scholarly publishing of close to $2.5 million for the past fiscal year, all but $150,000 is recovered from sales and funding outside the University. In the same time period, $139,000 was paid to the University as interest on loans.

Bohne noted that university of financial support for U of T Press from the university, Bohne stressed that the Press is determined to maintain financial responsibility for its operations. The financial priorities of U of T Press are best understood by experts in the publishing field, Bohne said. Nonetheless, Bohne insisted that the University play a more important role in the support of the Press. "The University has to realize that it must give support to scholarly publishing," he said.

In an address to the Association of American University Presses, Marsh Jeanneret, the previous director of U of T Press, said: "The end product of useful research of any kind must be publication, in including McGill and Queen's University presses.

"needs heavy subsidy."

Bohne is deeply concerned about the financial crisis facing U of T Press. "We have warned the University of this crisis for many years," Bohne said. Realizing that it is unlikely that the Press will be able to expand its scholarly program in the foreseeable future, Bohne also believes that the Press could not easily reduce its services. "Once you turn off the tap, you can't turn it on again so easily," he said. Furthermore, Bohne wondered, "Who's going to pick up the slack?" admitting the increasing importance of U of T Press to the presses in the United States regularly receive subsidies from their parent universities, as well as support from private foundations. Financial support for the university press from within the university has not been the policy at U of T, because of the Press's traditional financial independence.

The scholarly work of the Press could also be funded by an endowment from within the university. However, aside from endowments for specific projects (such as the Dictionary of Canadian Biography), there is no endowment plan for U of T Press.

Despite the demand for some form some form. Destroy or weaken the prospects of publication, and the research programmes will not only be rendered unproductive; they will wither and die, or at best degenerate into mockeries of the tradition they stand for."

The University of Toronto Press bears the brunt of this responsibility for the Canadian academic community. By reason of its intimate association with the Press, the University of Toronto must share the responsibility for the continuing quality and scope of scholarly publishing within U of T Press.

Quicker books

Beginning this summer an automated check-out system will be introduced on a trial basis in the Sigmund Samuel Library.

According to Anwar Saeed, head of reserves at Sig Sam, books are coded with a series of lines similar to those on the U of T student card. When a student borrows a book, he will scan it along with his student card in a computerized machine. This records the information and prints out the due date. The student takes this slip of paper from the computer and puts it in the back of the book.

Automation will cut down on filing currently required by library staff. They will be trained to operate the new machines, which only require key punch experience, Saeed said. Overdues will be indicated by computer and recorded, as well as holds and reserves.

According to Personnel Assistant Gail Baker automation will not significantly reduce the number of staff members a great deal. However, she said there will be a gradual cutback on students hired, probably by attrition. She commented that student workers are responsible and hardworking.

Saeed said automation will provide better services for students such as the bibliographic search service currently in operation. For a small fee students can request all available material at U of T on a certain topic. Saeed also said there is a possibility that the telephone renewal system may be reintroduced.

They may not be Celtic, but the dignitaries were out in full force last night at the new City Hall for the opening ceremonies of the U of T-based conference, Canada and the Celtic Consciousness. The week-long conference starts today and will play host to Celtically conscious poets, playwrights and politicians.

We're too polite over rights

By ROBERTA CLARE

"The Canadian disease is acceptance, refusal to see and, above all, politeness in discussing the violations of civil liberties." This charge was made by Clayton Ruby, criminal lawyer and panelist at the 15th Annual Conference on Law and Contemporary Affairs, sponsored by U of T law students at the Medical Sciences auditorium Friday.

"The patterns of our government are quite clear," Ruby explained. "It doesn't act on these violations or alternately it commits them itself. It follows that pattern with explanations that all too often simply are lies swallowed by a gullible public," he stated.

Guest speaker Alan Borovoy of the General Council to the Canadian Liberties Association highlighted the key problems of civil liberties with references to the Canadian Bill of Rights, "as they can be viewed as a barometer or statement of the values of our society." He cited a number of cases of falsely-accused violations within the last decade to show "the dichotomy between what the Bill of Rights appears to promise and what we really get."

Borovoy used the alleged RCMP break-ins of the Parti Quebecois (PQ) to indicate the extent to which civil liberties have been violated. His concern, he said, is not only the nature of the charges against the RCMP, but the official position of the federal government in response to those allegations. "It is the government's policy and posture that gives us an indication of what we might look forward to in so far as the adequate protection of the laws of this country are concerned," Borovoy explained.

He examined the "remarkable statements" of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau in response to the alleged break-ins. According to Borovoy, following the press conference where the break-ins were revealed "the Prime Minister was careful to say as a general disclaimer that the police, like everybody else, must obey the law." He continued that the Prime Minister in embellishing his statement discussed the "permissibility of periodic technical breaches of the law."

Borovoy asked, "Is the PM seriously trying to suggest that burglary and theft can be properly analogized with speeding violations? There are cases where the RCMP officers are supposed to have misled Cabinet Ministers on the basis of which those Ministers misinformed the House of Commons," he charged.

"The government rushes to amend the law but not to enforce it," Borovoy said. The prime minister has recently announced that "regardless of the mandate he has given to the Macdonald Royal Commission, he is seeking an amendment to the Post Office Act of the Criminal Code. A peculiar exercise in impatience," Borovoy argued. "In the meantime, the public respect for the rules of law in the administration of justice is bound to undergo some erosion," he warned.

"It's not merely civil liberties that are at stake but liberal democracy itself," Tom Gould, former director of News and Public Affairs at CTV, argued. "The adherence and enjoyment of civil liberties run in cycles, in wartime they go by the board," he maintained. With the War Measures Act in 1970, "a great polarization of Canadian unity began. The state developed a need to protect itself, from what we have not yet been told," Gould said.

Alan Bloom, U of T professor of Political Economy, defended certain limitations of the Freedom of Speech Act and argued against Borovoy's self-description as "a congenial non-absolutist." "How one handles their speech is a question of truths not rights," Bloom maintained.

Citing the example of the Nazis and Communists, Bloom explained "There must be public agreement on their untruths and they must be continually labelled as such. They are dangerous by their nature and everything must be done to keep them from our truths." Bloom accounted for the "deterioration of our understanding of freedom of speech" with the "transformation" from freedom of speech to freedom of expression.

Lawyers not guilty

By URIEL WITTENBERG

Lawyers must be judged on the basis of the professional services they render and not on winning or losing cases, said Professor Samuel Dash, former Chief Counsel to the U.S. Senate Watergate Committee.

In the keynote address at the 15th Annual Conference on Law and Contemporary Affairs last Saturday, Dash said a lawyer's reputation is often debased when handling criminal cases.

Although the afternoon session was entitled "Police Power: Its Extent and Abuse," Dash devoted his speech to the need for good legal counsel for the poor and the need to remove the stigma attached to representing criminals.

He opened his discussion by explaining that because his name had been "publicly linked" to the position of prosecutor in Philadelphia, it would be "inappropriate" for him to deal with the subject of the session.

A newspaper subsequently criticized him for having been a character witness for a lawyer whose clients included members of "the mob." The paper alleged that the lawyer had had "underworld" connections.

Dash offered this as an example of the public misconception of the criminal lawyer. He cited the code of the American Bar which states that a lawyer should disregard his personal feelings and public opinion in defending a client.

A criminal lawyer's reputation suffers even within the profession, said Dash. When lawyers feel they can't handle a certain type of case, they send it to a criminal lawyer thinking "he'll get it done, he'll perjure himself; he'll fix a juror."

Dash said that the controversy has been resolved over whether a lawyer should disclose to the court that his client is intentionally perjuring himself. If a client announces to his lawyer that he intends to perjure against it, the lawyer must advise him against it. If the client persists and does lie in court, a lawyer has the right to "allude to the perjury" when addressing the jury.

However, Mark Lynch, Counsel to the American Civil Liberties Union and another panelist at the session, pointed out that a professor at the law school he attended declared that confidential communication between client and lawyer, even in cases of perjury, should not be disclosed to the court.

Laurier Lament

By SANDY GRANT

In the last home match of the season the women's volleyball team finished by defeating Laurier Golden Hawks, three games to one.

The first game involved a lot of hustling and digging on the part of both teams. The Blues, however, enforced their attack policy and defeated the Hawks 17-15 in a hard fought game. In the next game Laurier did not fare as well as they had done in the first match, losing to the Blues by a score of 15-7.

Some outstanding performances were turned in by Blues players, Diane Boonstra, Kristi Varangu and Marianne Ekberg.

Unfortunately in the third game Toronto eased off on their attack and the quick moving game they had played earlier in the evening, and lost 15-7. In the final game U. of T. controlled the contest from the beginning as they led for the entire match and proved to the Hawks and fans that they weren't to be beaten again. The final score of the fourth game was 15-5 for the Blues.

Blues En Garde

By GLYNIS PETERS

Extending their winning streak, the women's fencing team emerged victorious this week-end from the second women's sectional. Judging from this week-end's performance, the entire U of T team will advance to the OWIAA finals.

In accordance with fencing rules, each member of the U of T team had to fence against each member of teams from Brock and McMaster. Toronto defeated Brock 11 bouts to five and McMaster 14-2. In the past the opposition has not been of a very high calibre but this year all the teams are showing improvement. Commenting on the Blues performance, Sue Langley said they were "thinking fighting".

Charlene Howett subbed in for Lily Dobay, who has the flu and did well, winning 5 out of eight bouts.

Captain Alice Chan turned in an impressive performance as she won all of her bouts. Along with Debbie Frankisk and Sue Langley she qualified for the individual OWIAA finals.

Toronto has won these finals for the past three years and it seems entirely possible that come February 25 and 26 at McMaster, they will be notching up another victory.

Brawl Erupts As Blues Crush Ottawa 13-1

By JIM O'LEARY

The U of T Hockey Blues are one game closer to an undefeated season after they demolished the University of Ottawa Gee Gees 13-1 in a brawl interrupted game at Varsity Arena Friday night.

The Blues have now won 14 and tied one of their 15 league games.

The powerful Blues scoring machine was working at its finest as Dan D'Alvise and Neil Korzack each picked up a hat trick. For Korzack it was his seventh goal in two games since he rejoined the Blues.

According to Doug Herridge, "Ottawa is fighting for a playoff spot," but went a little bit too far on Friday. With three minutes left in the game, Ottawa enforcer Francis Couturier went after Toronto's Wayne Morrissey to precipitate a bench-clearing brawl.

It all started when an Ottawa player was felled when he took a run at Morrissey. According to Morrissey, "I saw him coming and lifted my arms to protect myself and my stick caught him on the face."

As the player lay on the ice, Couturier jumped over the boards and, after finding out from team mates what happened, came at Morrissey. Both players stood toe-to-toe at center ice flailing away with Morrissey getting the better of the fight.

Couturier left the ice amid a chorus of boos after he flung his stick into the stands and made several obscene gestures to the audience.

Meanwhile, in the other main bout, Rob Gemmell outpointed the Gee Gee goalie Bill Thomson, in two separate battles. "They fight as well as they play hockey," commented Gemmell.

U of T coach Tom Watt thought the fight was "the stupidest, most needless thing I've ever seen in a hockey game." In defence of Morrissey Watt said "I'd do the same thing. Number 12 took a run at Davis and then tried to do the same to Morrissey. We were leading 10-1 at the time. Are we going to start a fight in a 10-1 hockey game?"

The Blues capitalized on Ottawa mistakes to take a 2-0 lead after only a minute and seven seconds of the first period. On the first, Dan Tsubouchi stole the puck in the Ottawa end and fired a low shot to the corner. Doug Caines stormed back for Toronto's second goal a few seconds later.

The Blues upped the count to 7-0 before Ottawa got on the scoreboard. Gemmell, D'Alvise, Korzack, Tsubouchi and Caines did the scoring. The Blues added two more, by D'Alvise and Hopkins, before the fight broke out.

The Varsity — Andrus Auzins

Neil Korzack (12) directs the puck into the net as Doug Caines looks on.

The Blues scored three more in the closing minutes of the game. Cary Farrell picked up his second goal and fifth point of the night, while Korzack rounded out his hat trick with the final two goals of the game. For Korzack it gave him six points for the night.

The Blues have a big week coming up. They play York on Wednesday, Queen's Friday and Ottawa again on Saturday.

Basketball Blues Blow Gaels Off The Court In Biggest Win Of Year

By HOWARD DEANE

The Basketball Blues netted their first 100 point game of the season, with a 106-62 win over the Queen's Golden Gaels, in a game at Benson Building Friday night.

The Blues shot extremely well from the floor hitting an average of 50 percent. Queen's was hitting on only 33 percent of their shots which was the essential difference.

Things looked bad for the Blues at the beginning, as the first pass sailed over Doug Fox's head. However, it was quickly retrieved and the Blues soon jumped to a 14-0 lead. They kept this lead and continued to increase it until the end of the game.

Toronto guard, Tim McGhie was the top scorer with 24 points. Bill Pangos had 20, while Randy Cook and Doug Fox both netted 14.

Cook is in contention for the league rebounding title, behind Laurentian's Varick Cutler. Cook added twelve more in Friday's game.

This win keeps Toronto in the race for a playoff spot. Coach John McManus commented, "We played really well tonight. We've still got a good chance for a playoff spot. If we tie with Ottawa, a decision will be made on total points. So our 106 points tonight really helped us."

At the half Toronto was ahead 50-32 and had little trouble increasing that lead. In the second half they outscored Queen's by 26 points. The Blues had little trouble controlling the play or in penetrating the Gael's defence.

Queen's coach, Pete Smith was put on report to the League Officials, by both the referee and McManus for an incident in the second half. Smith got upset over a call and called the referee a "pompous ass".

Right now, McManus has his eyes set on York. Toronto plays them twice next week. "They're a great team. When it all clears, they may be the best team in Canada."

Fencers Win

By JIM SCARROW

The U of T's men's fencing team placed first in all weapons classes against strong teams from York, Queen's, RMC, Trent and Carleton at the OUAA fencing sectionals at the Benson Building on Saturday.

As well as winning the team competition, U of T placed well in individual competitions with Rick Arthur, Jim Cheng, Imre Boma Fischer, Dave Hamer, Kevin Kurnik, and Brad Patterson advancing to the Ontario finals.

The first place foil members are Arthur, Kurnik and Alan Steljes. The first place sabre team members are Cheng, Fischer and Patterson. The first place Epee team is made of Hamer, Bruno Scherzinger and Wolfgang Wehrfritz.

Competitors praised U of T coach Ken Wood for the management of the competition which according to Patterson "was a model for others to follow."

Hamer, captain of the Epee team, sustained a painful injury towards the end of the team competition from an accidental fall. However, with the help of some ice packs and a tenacious spirit Hamer not only finished the day but finished first in the individual epee competition.

With a strong showing at this meet the U of T team is in good shape for the OUAA finals on February 11 at Western where, as sabre fencer Patterson put it, "that's where the work begins."

Blues Prepare For Yeomen

By HOWARD DEANE

The Basketball Blues are vying for their first playoff spot in years, and this week will provide a crucial test when they meet the York Yeomen twice. Carleton and Ottawa are hot on the heels of the Blues, forcing Toronto to play well if they want to make the playoffs.

The Yeomen are presently ranked second in the country, behind the Manitoba Bisons, and own a 7-1 record in league play. Their only loss being to Laurentian.

York has entered three tournaments this year, winning two of them. They have one overtime loss to Laurier in the championship game.

The reason for York's improvement over their third place team of last year is that they have acquired six quality players. Three are transfer students; one of whom is 6 foot 7 Paul Layefsky who played a year and a half for the Blues.

The other two are 6'10" Lonnie Ramati from Princeton, and 6'5" Frank Zulus from Concordia. Both Layefsky and Ramati are in Osgoode Law School.

York also acquired three top rookies. 6'3" Dave Coulthard and 6'4" Bo Pelech played for Canada's National "B" Team. Coulthard is currently one of York's leading scorers.

York plays a fast breaking disciplined style. They can afford to play a fast and physical game because they have so much bench strength. If one of their starters tire or run into foul trouble, they have strong players on the bench.

They are so strong that Chris McNeill, an OUAA All-Star last year, is now sitting on the bench.

If Toronto is to win one of these games (stranger things have happened), they will have to slow down, play a ball control game and make the most of the shooting opportunities.

Game time is Tuesday at 8:15 in the Benson Building.

Swimmers Take Dive

By JIM O'LEARY

According to Robin Campbell, U of T swim coach, the Blues turned in a "reasonable" performance as they dropped a dual meet to the Waterloo Warriors 68-45 on Friday.

The Warriors have three of the top-ranked swimmers in Canada which is a big advantage in dual meets. In championship meets, however, depth is more important, which is why Campbell is not too concerned about the loss.

"We are reasonably confident we can win the O.U.A.A.'s on depth," says Campbell. "In dual meets depth counts for nothing."

The Warriors swept 16 points from diving competition to lead them to victory. "Waterloo has the best divers in the country," according to Campbell. They are so powerful that Campbell didn't even bother to take the U of T divers to the meet.

For the Blues, Campbell was pleased with the showing of the 400 medley relay team which beat the defending C.I.A.U. champs in this event. The team, which is made up of Brad Myers, John Watt, Dan Thompson and Richard Torrance, handled the defending champs "very well," according to the coach.

Thompson turned in an all-round impressive performance. As well as the relay win, he also placed first in the 50 free style and 200 butterfly.

Watt turned in a very strong performance against Waterloo's Ron Campbell in the 200-metre breast stroke. Campbell is ranked 15th in the world in this event while Watt is virtually unranked. Despite this, Watt kept pace with his opponent until the last 25 yards of the race.

Rick Madge of U of T won the 200 individual medley.

Profs need more pay

By CONNIE FILLETTI

Salary negotiations between the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) and the university which officially began November 24 have gone into mediation, professor Jean Smith, chairman of the UTFA mediation team revealed in a telephone interview Monday.

Professor Dan Soberman of the Queen's University law faculty has been appointed mediator.

UTFA is asking for an across-the-board economic increase of eight per cent for all active and retired staff. The university is offering a 3.75 per cent increase. According to figures released by Statistics Canada, the rate of inflation is currently running at 9.2 per cent.

An UTFA report to Governing Council on mediation states that "the purpose of the annual across-the-board economic increase is to enable a faculty member or librarian to maintain the same relative economic position." The brief further states that this position is relative to previous real income, basic salaries of similar employees and average basic wages and salaries received by the rest of the labor force.

An 8.5 per cent increase is expected in the Consumer Price Index (CPI) for 1977-78. The report calls for UTFA's proposed eight per cent increase to be seen in light of the CPI hike. Any increase less than 8.5 per cent "will put even greater pressure on the salary negotiation process for 1978-80," the report claims.

Other benefits sought by UTFA include:

- pension plan improvements
- elimination of rank salary ceilings
- a special merit fund for librarians
- voluntary dental insurance plan
- home improvement loan guarantee
- extension of U of T's existing policy for free U of T tuition for academic staff to include their dependents.

Smith said he hopes that through the efforts of the mediator UTFA can reach a quick settlement with the university administration. Soberman must bring the two parties together by next Tuesday or submit his own report, binding on both parties unless rejected by a majority vote of Governing Council.

York fights cutbacks

By GEORGE COOK

Members of York University's Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA), threatened by massive layoffs at the end of the current academic year, are holding a rally this Thursday to oppose cutbacks to post-secondary education and the loss of their jobs.

As many as 300 members of the York GAA may have their employment terminated this spring due to provincial budget cuts to the university.

A week of protest has been organized by the York GAA. It is being supported by the York students' council, and by the York Faculty and staff associations.

Tony Woolfson, one of the organizers of the protests, said he wants to undertake joint action with the U of T and Ryerson GAA's in the near future. Representatives of the three groups will meet next Tuesday.

Several members of the U of T GAA will be in attendance at Thursday's rally. A working group of four people has been established by U of T's Graduate Students' Union to oppose cutbacks.

The working group is preparing a brief outlining government policy on cutbacks and U of T's response, according to group member Peter Gallus.

They hope to have the document along with several recommendations endorsed by as many U of T campus organizations as possible. Gallus said he hopes opposition to cutbacks could be bolstered simultaneously at Governing Council and among members of the university community.

The working group may recommend that the university open its budget to scrutiny, that deficit budgeting be considered and that the university administration protest cutbacks to post-secondary education.

The line-up at the starting gate

By PHILIP LIBMAN

In today's second article on the race for Governing Council, the remaining candidate for the undergraduate Arts and Science constituency and the four candidates on the two positions for part-time undergrad reps, were asked, "What has been and is your student governmental and political experience, and any other activities that would be relevant for Governing Council? What do you think is the major issue for the campaign and for Governing Council for next year?"

Frank Pegolo (Commerce and Finance Erindale III) lists his experience as being on "Erindale College Council," the executive committee of Erindale College Council and as an Erindale SAC rep. "The major issue, he feels, is budget cutbacks especially the cutting of courses like the Innis College courses. "Many students will be affected and what happens to them is not really fair. The amount saved is negligible."

The part-time students are as follows: Bev Batten feels that the major issue is the Macdonald Report. Her political experience as a member of the Planning and Priorities subcommittee for two years, the Faculty of Arts and Science General Committee and some of its sub committees, and "representing part-time students by working in the APUS office, and working with the concerns of part-time students directly."

John Dadds, 37, lists his experience: "I've been working since 16, and a member of a police force since 19. I've worked for the Metropolitan Police of London, England, Metro Toronto Police (one year), and the OPP since 1967. Presently I work in the OPP complaints bureau. A member of a police force can't take part in partisan politics, so I have no experience there and I have no student political experience. I have been involved with a number of service organizations. I have three teenaged kids who are all in high school and hopefully will go to U of T so what goes on at Governing Council now will affect them in a few years. The issue is the proposal to change the entrance requirements. We must find out how this will affect the university's standing in the community. There is an awful lot of static between the university and the community. People outside see the university doing little."

Sandra Jolley has been a part-time student at U of T since 1973. She has been an "on-again, off-again" representative for APUS in that time. She was class president in her first and third years of nursing, and has been active on the municipal, provincial and federal levels in election campaigns. "I've done just about every job there is to do," said Jolley. She is a charter member of Women for Political Action, a group in existence since 1973 to heighten women's awareness of their political power. Jolley sat as one of the two part-time undergrad reps last year, and was on the Business, Internal and External Affairs committees. Jolley said: "I think the Macdonald Report is going to take an awful lot of energy for the next two years. The faculty is a very strong group and they are organized. Students will have to challenge faculty priorities."

The fourth candidate, Joseph Samuel Garten was unavailable for comment and will appear in our next article.

Court for ex-president

By NICK MAROTTA

The Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) will be taking former SCSC president Gary Sands to court in an effort to end the long, drawn-out and sometimes bitter financial dispute between Sands and the student council.

The council called a meeting on Sunday to arrive at an agreement over $330 the council says Sands owes from his 1976-77 term as council president. A motion was passed allowing SCSC President John Shalagan and Vice-President Paul Seelig to handle the affair at their own discretion.

Shalagan and Seelig brought a letter stating that they would desist from pursuing legal action if Sands reimbursed the college. Sands contended that the letter was inappropriately worded in that it didn't exonerate him from the financial discrepancies attributed to him by council.

Sands, addressing the meeting Sunday in what he termed an attempt to present both sides of the question, expressed a desire to deal with insinuations that he had overdrawn his account or illegally signed cheques during his term of office.

The date for the small claims court case is set for April 20.

Defendant Gary Sands when he was head of Scarborough student council.

Varg Editor '78

The Varsity Committee invites applications for the position of The Varsity Editor-in-chief for the 1978-79 publishing year.

As well as resumes of work experience and educational background applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the format, editorial policy, internal structure or aspects of production. The editor will have to work with a large staff — currently numbering approximately 100 members — in devising and implementing these changes. Candidates may suggest names for the other editorial positions. The amount available for production staff this year is $16,730 including a weekly stipend of $155 for the editor-in-chief. The editor generally works a fifty to eighty hour week.

Applicants will be interviewed by both the Varsity staff and the Varsity Committee. The staff shall select its choice in an election — the successful candidate must obtain 50 per cent plus one of the votes cast — and the Committee will then consider ratification of the staff choice. The editor may be removed from his position only by concurrent decision of the Varsity staff and the Varsity Committee.

Address written applications to:

way. This way, if the fee increase is passed, we can plan to have the income in a year's time and plan accordingly."

Gerhart explained that SAC adjusts its fee at large intervals of time "as we can't do it every year. It is best to start it high, accumulate a surplus for a few years, then run deficits for a few years, eating away at the accumulated surplus, and then institute a new fee. All our surplus will be gone by next year, and the new fee will be appropriate."

As SAC President John Tuzyk, who advocates that the increase be effective in 1978, was away at Brock University on student business, the decision passed unopposed with one abstention.

Parrott knew all along, MPPs say

By ERIC McMILLAN

The day after students were told that more information on the new student aid plan "will not be known until March," Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities offered "confidential" information about the proposals to opposition members.

MPPs Ted Bounsall (NDP) and John Sweeney (Liberal) told a group of 20 students Monday they were certain the new student aid plan had been finalized before their January 13 meeting with the minister.

Parrott's "travelling road show" around Ontario to discuss the proposals with students was "just a charade," Sweeney charged. The U of T student council (SAC) and Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) could not have real input into decisions that had already been made, said Sweeney.

Bounsall charged that Parrott was leaving the announcement until March because it would be more difficult for students to organize against the changes at the end of the term.

OFS treasurer Carol McAulay said the federation would consider "some kind of mass action" on student aid in March. OFS is meeting with the Ontario cabinet Thursday and will hold a plenary immediately afterwards to plan future actions.

The two opposition universities critics, McAulay, and SAC president John Tuzyk were speaking at a student aid forum organized by the St. Mike's student union.

Tuzyk would not commit himself to any action by SAC but said a Queen's Park rally against cutbacks two years ago forestalled the most drastic recommendations of the McKeough-Henderson report. The report had proposed higher tuitions, cutbacks and stiffer student aid regulations.

Tuzyk said student pressure through SAC and OFS had some effect on Parrott. He listed as successes consideration of regional differences, evaluation of actual summer earnings, grants being available before loans, and loans not being collected until a graduate finds work.

The opposition critics agreed that some amendments had been made but also pointed to their shortcomings.

Bounsall and Sweeney argued there was no guarantee that putting grants before loans meant a substantial number of students would receive any more grant money than under the present plan. In fact some students may end up "a lot worse off than before," said Bounsall.

Sweeney predicted a decrease in enrolment in September due to confusion over the new regulations. If details are not known until late March, high school graduates won't be able to decide on their future until summer, he noted.

Student aid applicants may be faced with as many as four application forms to fill out next year, said Sweeney.

Both Sweeney and Bounsall admitted they had no power to force changes in Parrott's student aid plan, except to give the minister a hard time during question period. They asked for continued SAC and OFS lobbying.

April 1 set as protest date for new Immigration Act

By ROBERT FIFE

A National Day of Protest to oppose the implementation of Bill C-24 was set for April 1 by former members of the now defunct Toronto Working Committee on Immigration (TWCI) Monday. Although Bill C-24 affects foreign and immigrant students, the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) and the U of T Graduate Students' Union (GSU), who had both been members of the committee, were not at the meeting.

Bill C-24, an immigration act passed by Parliament last July and to be implemented on April 1, hits foreign students hard with measures aimed at reducing their numbers in Canada.

Formed last spring, TWCI, consisting of over 60 immigrant, legal, church, and community organizations as well as OFS and GSU, fought unsuccessfully against the bill. Upon passage of the bill, TWCI decided to continue its fight until various groups, including the OFS and GSU, voted to discontinue their membership in the organization. Shortly thereafter TWCI folded.

OFS spokesman Chris Allnutt, when asked why his organization had opted out of TWCI, replied that the committee was no longer viable. According to Allnutt TWCI "was no longer doing anything productive." He said that OFS was unable to attend Monday's organizational meeting because of "time restraints." However, Allnutt said "OFS would consider participating in the National Day of Protest."

Allnutt said that because OFS was not working with the former members of TWCI, this did not mean it was unconcerned about Bill C-24. He said that OFS is "working with the Law Union" on the new act and has urged the Canadian Bureau for International Education to write a guide book to inform foreign and landed immigrant students about the bill's repressive measures. "OFS is also considering raising Bill C-24 as an election issue," said Allnutt.

Leo Casey, Vice-President of GSU, said that GSU left TWCI because a minority group, which he refused to identify, within the committee was pursuing a "letter than thou" brand of politics that scared away important church and labor organizations. He said GSU felt that TWCI could be successful only through a "broadly based coalition, which it was at first, until it became entangled in sectarian politics."

Asked why GSU did not attend Monday's meeting, Casey said, "We were unaware of the meeting." He said that the GSU would consider joining the National Day of Protest provided it was a broadly based coalition. At present the GSU is "not doing anything about Bill C-24," said Casey. He said that the "GSU is thinking about bringing the provincial government to court over the differential fee structure for foreign students."

Bill C-24 seriously affects foreign and landed immigrant students. Foreign students are not permitted to work while in Canada or to apply to have their status changed. This, coupled with the hike in tuition fees for foreign students, means that poorer students, particularly from the developing countries, are unable to acquire an education in Canada.

The new act gives immigration officers the right to require students to report to them on a monthly basis to answer questions or show proof of financial standing. Under the bill landed immigrants can easily be deported. This can hinder immigrant students from getting involved in politics both on and off campus.

Other repressive features of Bill C-24 according to Kay Riddell, TWCI member are: measures allowing for deportation for reasons of "national security" without an effective right to challenge these reasons; broad powers to arrest without a warrant; powers to impose through regulation the identification of all non-Canadian residents; and measures allowing for the possible deportation of persons for associating with members or groups that "may" engage in violence.

"New New Program" given final approval

By BLAIR HUNTER

On Monday the General Committee of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science completed the task it began earlier this month by approving the fourth and final recommendation of Erindale College's controversial "New New Program."

This recommendation (a procedural detail requiring the new curriculum policy to be reviewed not later than the 1983-84 academic session) was held-over business from the previous meeting on January 23.

The Governing Council must now consider the proposals of the New New Program. Their decision is the last obstacle in front of a stricter curriculum for Erindale College and English language proficiency tests at the St. George Campus to be implemented by 1980.

Students' Administrative Council (SAC) representatives John Doherty and Brian O'Riordan addressed the meeting in a futile attempt to force the Arts and Science General Committee to send the New New Proposals in their amended form back to the Erindale College Council (ECC) for further consideration.

The ECC, comprising Erindale faculty and students, approved the report of the New New proposals with the rider that any changes made as a result of ensuing committee work would cause the report to be returned to the ECC for reconsideration of their endorsement.

At the January 23 meeting the Arts and Science General Committee rejected the New New proposals that Erindale students be required to take either two courses in a language other than English or two courses in the field of mathematics. Also rejected was the recommendation that Commerce students be automatically exempt from all these new recommendations should they come to pass.

Because the rejection of these proposals constitutes a change in the structure of the New New Program, Doherty and O'Riordan requested that the ECC be allowed to reconsider the report before Governing Council makes its decision.

Chairman D.G. Ivey however, ruled O'Riordan and Doherty out of order, suggesting that if ECC wishes to reconsider, then the Governing Council must be approached through some other channel than the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

After the meeting, Doherty said he would move at Tuesday's scheduled meeting of the ECC executive that they address a formal letter to Governing Council expressing ECC's desire for further revision of the amended New New proposals before they are brought before Governing Council.

In other business, Associate Dean Charles Churcher asked the General Committee to reaffirm a request made at the last meeting "that grades should be reported to students in the form they are recorded by the Faculty." Churcher also moved that "permission to report grades for the winter session 1977-78 and the summer session 1978 in percentage form in addition to letter grades" be requested from the Academic Affairs Committee of Governing Council.

On both points the General Committee expressed overwhelming approval.

The Varsity - Mary Bryson

During Reading Week Jeff Milligan and Geoff Hladem shift their activities.

Sleep, tan and ski; No time for reading

By BILL NANKIVELL

Florida, Quebec, sleeping, and last and almost least, reading. These were responses to a Varsity survey this week which asked students what they planned to do during Reading Week.

Of the students questioned, only slightly less than half indicated they would be doing any work next week. The majority of students had many more interesting things to do. As Jack Preobrazenski (P.Ed. IV) said, Reading Week is "time to catch up on my non-reading time," and he seemed to sum up the feelings of many at U of T.

Florida did indeed seem to be a popular destination for Reading Week travellers. Students are planning to go with friends, family or alone to see if a little sunshine can improve their mental health. Surprisingly, few of those going south planned to take any work with them. Another spot for travellers was Quebec, but not necessarily for skiing. Paul Reid (Trin. IV) and Anne Sorensen (Rehab. Med. IV) are two members of the Hart House chorus which is performing in Montreal and Quebec City.

Most of the people who said they would not be working are planning to stay in Toronto, many claiming that they could not afford any trips. Activities at U of T next week range from performing in recitals to playing in a marathon basketball game.

A group of students from the Faculty of Physical Education are attempting to get in the Guinness Book of World Records by playing 101 hours of basketball from Tuesday morning to sometime Saturday in the lower gym at Hart House. The current record is 75 hours, and they are allowed only five minutes sleep per hour.

However, some students are planning to keep up the academic side of their life. According to Karen Fenwick (UC III), next week is "not a vacation, but a work week." She did admit she felt "unique" in her attitude. As with most of those planning to work next week, Fenwick has at least four major assignments.

It seems that people either have no work to do or a lot, and students who said they would be working feel they are conscientious students. Richard Janda (Trin I), said he is going to start "fretting about exams," as well as writing essays and reading.

A big favorite though is doing absolutely nothing. A sample of responses brought these comments: "sleeping," "staying in bed," "nothing." Robin Shields (UC III) is going to "watch my soap operas," while David Greenblum (Med IV) claimed "I don't plan that far ahead."

Skiing was not as popular as it is made out to be. Only a few students are going out of Ontario to ski, though many wished they were going. Many students seemed content to enjoy a mixture of skiing at Collingwood, partying at night, and doing (or claiming to do) a minor amount of school work.

For some students Reading Week is seen as a time to go home or visit friends. Destinations vary from New York City, to East Lansing, Michigan, to Oshawa. A quick look at the ride board in Sid Smith lobby will confirm the variety of places being visited next week.

U of T athletes, such as Rob Gimmell (WDW III), a Varsity Blues hockey player, plan to spend Reading Week practicing and training. For most athletes the season is not interrupted by an academic holiday.

Other students are going to be earning money, either at old summer jobs, or getting extra hours on regular part-time jobs. For Cynthia Turner, a part-time student, it will be "work as usual."

Some will find time to catch up on hobbies such as music or handball, while some students, such as one poor man, said, "I am in medicine. I get no holiday."

Editorial writers are, by nature, a shy, deferential lot, ever reluctant to propound strong views.

AID OR FRAUD?

Those present at the Jan. 12 meeting with Harry Parrott will remember the allegation made by one student at the meeting, that the final draft of the new student aid plan was to be ready for printing by Jan. 23. The student had been given this information by the company which is printing the 1978 student aid brochures. Parrott could only equivocate on this. Admitting it outright would have meant dismissing his visit to U of T as a charade.

Now we learn from two opposition critics that the day after Parrott came to U of T he was in position to release details of the new program (a parental contribution table among others) which he won't release to students before March. Contrary to what Parrott kept saying at the U of T meeting most of the details of the new program were decided on long ago.

This, of course, comes as no surprise. The government never had any intention of letting students change its plans. Making it difficult for people to go to university is the government's response to the current economic crisis. Nobody, least of all students, is going to change that without also changing the government. And the government isn't about to turn against itself. So the only thing left for Parrott to do after he and his colleagues had decided to change the old OSAP program was to keep the students occupied while the program was finalized.

Student leaders are fond of saying that because of pressure from the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) the new program will incorporate some "progressive" changes. However even NDP critic Ted Bounsall, who otherwise advocates support of OFS's tactics, could not agree with this. The changes we know about, he said, are either for the worse or else leave the program untouched. If as OFS claims the changes in the program are the result of its lobbying, OFS is going to have a hard time explaining how it pressured the government into making the programme worse than it was before.

If students are to win anything from the government they are going to have to rely on the strength of their numbers. The belief that students can improve the program through negotiation is a serious delusion. Negotiation doesn't oblige Parrott to do anything except talk, an activity he is quite willing to indulge in since it keeps students occupied and quiet. Meanwhile the program is changed for the worse.

In March Parrott will make the new program public. The timing is well chosen since students will at that time be busy preparing for their exams and will have difficulty organizing a protest.

It's time to stop talking and start organizing.

In the Varsity for Monday, 6 February, Michael Mandryk wrote in a spirit of concern about the quantity of German and Japanese language material in the Robarts Library. Not being a fan of Hogan's Heroes, and having allowed the passions of the early 1940s to cool, I do not wish to support Mr. Mandryk's particular ethnological inclinations. But, as chairman of the President's Advisory Committee on the Library System, I would like to say that Mr. Mandryk does have a point about the library. For the past ten years the purchasing power of the library has been declining. Apart from a small increase last year, the budget for buying books and periodicals has been at the same level for a decade. Increasingly over that time, inflation in the price of new books at a rate of over 10 per cent p.a., 16 per cent for periodicals, and the recent devaluation of the Canadian dollar, have put the library's acquisition budget under enormous strain. The library has tried to maintain a policy of systematically acquiring new books in a broad range of subjects and languages. This policy is directed towards building up and maintaining the library of the University of Toronto as a major research library. Because our library is by far the largest in Canada and ranks among the top ten or fifteen in North America, this policy, I think, has been both realistic and responsible. As a research collection, the University of Toronto library fulfils an important function in Canadian scholarly life. And because other university libraries in Ontario have come to count on the Toronto library as a source of foreign language material and other exotica which they can borrow on interlibrary loan, those libraries have been able to concentrate more on books which are heavily used in the teaching programmes of their universities. The University of Toronto library, on the other hand, has put the acquisition of books for teaching at a lower level of priority than books for research. Ten years ago the library was able to buy multiple copies of those books which were under heavy demand from students. The fiscal squeeze now makes that practice nearly impossible, and duplicate copies along with other useful services have been cut in order to maintain a respectable research collection. There are probably no recently published English language books on Japanese cities or German kings that our library does not have. But if Mr. Mandryk had located an appropriate title in the catalogue, there is a good chance that he would have discovered that the book was charged out when he told a librarian that he could not find it in the stacks. I would like to know if there are many students who find it difficult to locate the books they need for essays or for seminar or tutorial discussions, and I would appreciate their sending a brief note addressed to me at the History Department. If the Library Advisory Committee learns that there is widespread concern about the library's services to students, we might be able to do something about it.

Reinboth retorts

Who is George M. Cook that he feels he can walk in off the street and claim to understand Innis College? The editorial in last Friday's Varsity misrepresents the College, the facts, and me. Any lingering doubt about the Varsity's incompetence is removed by the publication of such a scurrilous editorial on Innis College. It's a sad reflection indeed on Canadian student journalism.

Mr. Cook, seeing himself in the role of a Messiah, comes barnstorming onto the scene, a visionary throwback to the '60's. This consummate "Jimmy Olsen" in an attempt to enliven a dull university environment, creates issues and then blows them out of proportion. INI 213Y is not a devastating loss to the Independent Studies sequence of courses. Second year students can still take Independent Studies at the third year level providing they have the ability. This is how our course design currently works.

With evangelical fervor, Cook belittles a Student Society that has been taking serious, concrete steps to preserve a College Programme. Egged on by his peers, he leads a divine crusade against what he terms "THE ENEMY WITHIN". Why has this man taken up the sword? Why is he attempting to "enlighten" the oppressed masses that Reinboth is ripping off? Are these slanderous allegations a feather in his cap?

Here's the hair-shirted man of the Varsity editorship. He continues in the tradition begun by MacMillan and continued so ably by Cutajar this year.

Seriously, George, did you ever consider asking the students of this College what kind of job I'm doing? They will be able to tell you if any selling out has been done.

David Reinboth
President, ICSS

Plain English

"The results of English composition work in colleges are far from satisfactory... Few branches of educative work are attacked more frequently or more bitterly on the score of inefficiency. Only the totally uninitiated any longer suppose that the conversation and the personal or business correspondence of college students is either precise or elegant. At Harvard College, where, I believe, courses in English composition were first initiated... a committee of the faculty is operating under a vote of the Board of Overseers, a vote which states that students fail to write correct, coherent, and idiomatic English and demands the formulation of some plan for bettering the written and spoken English of Harvard students. If other institutions are not confessing to themselves a similar condition, who shall say that it is not because they are in that respect far in the rear of Harvard?" — English Journal, 1917.

"What is deficient preparation for work in college English? In most cases it is simply the inability to write either clearly or correctly. Sentences are run together without capital letter or period to indicate the division. Subordinate clauses are written as if they were complete sentences. A half dozen or more misspelled words may be found on a single page of manuscript. Errors in grammar abound; adjectives are used as adverbs; singulars appear when plurals are required; there are pronouns without antecedents; verbs without subjects, and subjects without verbs. Crudities of the playground and street appear in serious writing. The idea is often lost in a maze of vague phrases." — The Preparation in English of Purdue Freshmen, 1926 (cited in Teaching of English Composition in Teachers Colleges, 1928).

Parrott comes again

from the OSAP research group

The Minister of Colleges and Universities, Harry Parrott, comes to the fifth floor lounge of Sid Smith at 5 p.m. this Thursday to talk to part-time undergraduate students about proposed changes in the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP). The following is a brief analysis of the proposed changes as they affect part-time students.

According to research done by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) there will be no change in the criterion for determining who is a part-time student. If you are taking less than four courses (i.e., less than 80 per cent of a normal full-course load), you are eligible for assistance as a part-time student. Students taking only one course, however, may not be eligible for any assistance.

At present a part-time student is eligible for loans under OSAP, but is not eligible for grants. Under the proposed plan part-time students will be eligible for loans as well as grant assistance.

According to OSF, however, only a small number of part-time students will be eligible for these grants. In a background paper from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities (MCU) released last year, eligible part-time students "will be expected to contribute on the basis of the time they have available for employment."

This means that if you take less than four courses the calculation of your contribution from personal income will be higher than that used for full-time students, because you are considered by MCU to have more time available for employment. If you are unemployed you will still be expected to make an unspecified minimum contribution to your education based on time available for employment.

According to OFS a student working full-time for the minimum wage who takes two university courses will receive no assistance under the proposed Ontario Study Grant Plan (OSGP). Nor will a part-time student taking three courses and earning $135 a week receive any OSGP assistance.

The ministry has stated that students seeking provincial grant assistance will be "encouraged" to enrol on a full-time basis.

Under the proposed plan students will be eligible for grant assistance for a maximum of eight eligibility periods, the equivalent of four years of post secondary education. Part-time students, however, usually take more than four years to complete their education.

According to OFS research full-time student becomes eligible for assistance immediately upon registration. An eligibility period is used up whether or not a student applies for or receives any assistance.

The ministry has said, however, that the eligibility of part-time students will be assessed in terms of the academic equivalents of these eligibility periods. This means that one course will equal roughly one fifth of a grant eligibility period. MCU, however, has not laid down specific guidelines detailing the effects of eligibility periods on part-time students.

It is still unclear which students will be eligible for grant or loan assistance under the new scheme and how much they will receive.

INI Courses Cut

By BRENDA MILLER

The axe has fallen on courses at Innis College.

Design As a Social Activity (INI 232) will be discontinued altogether. Three courses (Workshop in Community Involvement (INI 331), Toronto's Changing Communities (INI 333) and Urban Issues Through Community Involvement (INI 431)) will be discontinued, although two new courses may be drawn up to replace them next year. The existing specialist and minor programs in Community Living Program (CLP) will be discontinued immediately, with provisions for students currently enrolled to complete their courses.

The "gist" of these decisions, made by the Committee on Academic Standards of the Faculty of Arts and Science on Friday, were presented to the Innis College Academic Affairs Committee (ICAAC) by William Saywell, principal of Innis, last night.

The decisions of the committee have not yet been documented and are still in the printing stages, according to John Ota, ICAAC chairperson.

The qualifications of the instructors of the previously threatened Childhood, Family Life and the Community (INI 233) will also be examined. Investigation will be undertaken as to the merging of the Community Living Program with the Urban Studies section at Innis, according to Saywell.

Innis College has the option of proposing new specialist and minor programmes in CLP. But their adoption, as well as the adoption of the two new courses to replace INI 331, 333 and 431 must be ratified by ICAAC as well as the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards and the Committee on Academic Standards before being offered to students.

ICAAC decided to initiate subcommittees to investigate, over the next two months, course proposals to replace INI 331, 333 and 431, the possibilities for a CLP-Urban Studies merger, and new program proposals in the area of CLP.

Cuts to the Independent Studies program will be discussed in the February 28 meeting of ICAAC. Wendy Donner, Co-ordinator of the Independent Studies program, said that because of their vague nature, different interpretations can be taken from the decisions to cut these courses. She requested that the motions be put before the committee in writing before discussion is initiated.

MIND EXPANDING

The SAC-funded University of Toronto Sexual Education Centre, located at 44 St. George Street, Room 25, invites you to take part in its Sexuality Awareness Week — Monday, February 20th to Friday, February 24th. The week will be highlighted by a series of forums and workshops in the Medical Science Auditorium starting at 8 p.m., Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

The forums, free and open to all members of the university community, will start on Monday evening with a talk by Lettie Cox, a marriage counsellor, and sexual therapist at the Montreal General Hospital. Ms. Cox will discuss Human Sexual Response: Facts and Fallacies. As with all of the forums, the course and scope of the discussion will be left up to the interaction and dialogue that is generated by the audience and the speaker.

On Tuesday evening, Susan Cole, a researcher with the Women's Health Organization of Toronto, will speak on The Politics of Contraception. Ms. Cole will approach issues such as where the money for pharmaceutical research comes from and the possible reasons why, a fool-proof contraceptive has not as yet been developed.

A COUNSELLOR AT THE SEXUAL EDUCATION CENTRE

Wednesday night will see Dr. Gregory Baum, Professor of Religion at St. Michael's College discussing Faith and Sexuality - A Christian-Judaic Perspective. Dr. Baum is the author of the recently published book Religion and Alienation.

Sexuality Awareness Week will conclude on Thursday and Friday with a display on Birth Control Methods. Featured in the foyer of Robarts Library on Thursday afternoon from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., and at the SAC booth in the lobby of Sidney Smith Hall on Friday, February 24th from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., the display will be staffed by a Counsellor there for discussion.

The Sexual Education Centre offers a number of services, including birth control information, V.D. information, pamphlets relating to other areas of sexuality, pregnancy counselling and referrals to doctors, clinics, and hospitals.

Designed to make people more aware of issues surrounding sexuality, the centre is open to everyone. Run by trained student volunteers, the Sexual Education Centre works from a philosophy based on confidential, non-judgmental, peer group counselling.

Debbie Mills is the Centre's Co-ordinator and Cynthia Turley is the Director of Education. The Sexual Education Centre can be reached at 978-3977.

CHAMPION RIDER FEBRUARY 15th

Not only horsemen-and-women but anyone who likes to watch horses go through their paces will be interested in guest speaker Ed Rothcranz, speaking at Scarborough College, Wednesday, February 15th.

Mr. Rothcranz is an advanced dressage champion and internationally celebrated master of stadium jumping. Dressage is a form of riding that consists of gymnastic exercises done by a horse in the flat (on a field). Mr. Rothcranz will be available to answer your questions at 7 p.m. in Room S-319. Tickets are $2.50 at the door and $2.00 if you buy them in advance. The event is sponsored by the SAC-supported University of Toronto Riding School on the Scarborough campus (282-5309) and the Equerry Stables in Scarborough.

The film to be shown is better than anything you'll see on television.

GREAT FILM DOUBLE-HEADER

SAC's Cinema Gratis isn't foolin' around, sweetheart. You take it from me, see: one of the greatest double-headers of the season is booked into Erindale College, (Room 292, Thursday, February 9th at 5 p.m.), Scarborough College, (Room H216, Friday, February 10th at 7 p.m.) and down at the Old Med Sci Auditorium, (Saturday, February 11th at 7 p.m.). Humphrey Bogart, Ingrid Bergman, Claude Rains and Peter Lorre in Casablanca, the ultimate classic war drama. Not bad, you say? But as great as that is, that ain't all that Cinema Gratis has in store for you. The second feature is Play It Again Sam with Woody Allen and Diane Keaton. It's all about a Bogart fan who's haunted by doin' things as only the master could. A very funny film — and all for the price of a smile. Here's lookin' at you and two good flicks, kid.

WOMEN AND EMPLOYMENT

The SAC Women's Commission asks you to mark down Tuesday, February 21st at 1 p.m. as a time and date you won't want to miss. Dian Cohen, Toronto Star business and economics columnist, Shelly Acheson, Human Rights Director of the Ontario Federation of Labour, and Patricia Adams, President of the Association of Women Executives will be speaking on Women, Post-Secondary Education and Unemployment in the University College East Hall. Admission is free.

Now... more than ever the RCMP offers a rewarding career

If you've ever considered a career in law enforcement, now's the time to talk to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The opportunities have never been greater.

For instance, the RCMP is accepting applications from both men and women, married and single. And the salary scale has increased considerably. It starts at $13,500. per year ($260. weekly) with regular increases to $19,000. ($365. weekly) in the first four years.

If accepted as a member of the Force, you'll receive intensive training in all aspects of police work such as law, investigation, first aid and community relations. Then you'll be posted to a detachment where there's every chance to put your knowledge and talents to work; to earn promotion and, equally important, be proud of what you're doing for yourself and for Canada as a member of one of the finest police forces in the world.

So if you're a Canadian citizen 18 or over and in good physical condition; think about a career with the RCMP.

Call or write your nearest office or use the coupon. We'd like to tell you more.

Gay rights grab the limelight

By ERIC STARKMAN

A public meeting called yesterday to discuss the implications of the police raid on the offices of the homosexual newspaper the Body Politic became an attack on the commercial press and the "straight" community for their interpretation of homosexual activities.

The audience of approximately 60 people was addressed by David Gibson of the Body Politic editorial board, Douglas Chambers, Professor of English at Trinity College, and Chris Bearchell, member of the Body Politic "Free The Press Fund."

Gibson said that his newspaper was "the voice of a people long suppressed." He stated that the editors had no remorse for printing the article "Men Loving Boys" but regretted that it had caused so much trouble for the homosexual community. He maintained that the article, which explicitly described sexual encounters between men and boys, was a "responsible discussion" on adult-child relationships and did not warrant the vociferous attack it received from the commercial media.

Gibson also attacked the commercial media for ignoring or misrepresenting homosexual activities. He said that a rally organized to protest the arrival of Anita Bryant was completely ignored in the Toronto papers, despite the fact that 1,000 people attended. He said he was particularly disturbed by the minimal coverage of the passage of sexual orientation into the human rights bill of Quebec.

Chambers also took issue with the coverage of homosexual activities by the commercial press. He said he was annoyed by the commercial press' refusal to accept homosexual ads, which he said resulted from a fear of advertisers. He was extremely critical of newspaper columnists Claire Hoy and Norman Webster, adding "We can't have a discussion with people who call us scum."

The most emotional speech was that of Chris Bearchell. She said that heterosexuals had two images of homosexuals, decent and offensive. Decent homosexuals, she said, are those who did not express their sexuality and "know their place in society." The offensive homosexuals are those who are not ashamed to admit their sexual preference. She said that bigotry was "alive and well" and was constantly manifesting itself in the daily press.

When asked why there were no representatives from the "straight" community to give their point of view at the Graduate Students' Union sponsored forum, Bearchell replied "Their side gets represented everytime you pick up the Star, the Globe and the Sun, so we figured what the hell."

Women defended in co-ed contact sports

By JIM O'LEARY

Noted sport personality and activist Abby Hoffman struck a blow for women's rights when she defended last night the right of women to participate in recreational co-ed contact sports.

Speaking at the Med Sci auditorium before a sparse audience of about 40, Hoffman attacked a decision made by the U of T Athletic Council Jan. 9 which prohibits women from competing in many co-ed sports.

Forced off track

At the outset Hoffman stated "I am not neutral. My comments are biased." She recalled the times she was asked to leave the Hart House track in 1964 which has left her bitter about discrimination against women athletes on campus.

According to Hoffman, arguments against co-ed contact sport are dangerous and lead to a patronizing image of women. The idea of women being inferior has been developed over the years and has made it difficult for many to distinguish between ability and sex when deciding the makeup of teams.

Women have been less involved traditionally in sports because of biological and cultural limitations, said Hoffman. Although she admits that the average male may be physiologically and structurally superior in some respects, Hoffman said, "I am not aware of any men's sport that women cannot play."

Fewer opportunities

Culturally, women are discriminated against in sports at most levels of competition. Women have far fewer opportunities to become involved in sport because of "antiquated ideas," said Hoffman.

Hoffman rebuked most of the arguments which have been used to keep women out of co-ed sport.

Just because it is against the rules is a specious argument, according to Hoffman.

The fear that men will take over the women's leagues if open competition is allowed is irrational according to Hoffman. She said it should be presupposed that people will act with common sense.

Co-ed sport at the recreational level will not necessarily lead to co-ed participation at all levels of competition, according to Hoffman. "I'm not sure that naturally follows," she said. She pointed to the Olympics where sports are segregated to conform to levels of ability, not arbitrary decisions based on sex.

Men's problem

To say that men will not play with the same intensity against women is the men's problem, according to Hoffman. This is an undesirable product of our cultural conditioning, she feels.

Hoffman said that "women have been badly served by physiologists." She feels their studies have concentrated on things like the menstrual cycle, reproduction, and labor and delivery of women athletes rather than on the susceptibility of women to injury.

Finally, she also urged that the university not be concerned with liability in the event of an injury to a female athlete. According to Hoffman, the university is involved in many dangerous activities which they try to control but have insurance in case of an accident. Such should be the case with co-ed sport, she said.

Labor ed. courses get $50,000

By PETER HOENADEL

The University of Toronto may be able to offer extension courses in the field of labor education in the near future. The federal Department of Labor has been offering education grants of up to $50,000 as a part of its Labor Education Program.

Elmer Renaud, assistant coordinator for the program, explained that the grants will be used to instruct union employees in the process of negotiation. Other aspects of labor, such as safety, pensions and the Ontario Labor Relations Act would also be a part of the proposed programs. Applications for the grant must be made through a trade union, according to Renaud.

Renaud said he sent applications for the program to Woodsworth College, but representatives of the college knew nothing about the matter. A spokesman for U of T's Centre for Industrial Relations expressed great interest in the program. The centre now offers a graduate program in Industrial Relations at U of T that draws on the resources of eight departments. The Centre for Industrial Relations is presently negotiating with the Department of Labor to see if some of the grant money could be used at U of T.

A grant under this program has already been issued to the Labor Studies Program of Humber College in Toronto.

U of T's Basketball B

Women - since 1921

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

BRONZE BABY TRISECTED!

So screamed a Varsity headline after Varsity Blues won their last basketball crown in 1969. Actually, Blues tied with Western and McMaster and "the coveted Bronze Baby" was divided equally among the three.

But the "Bronze Baby", emblematic of dominance in Women's Intercollegiate Basketball, has a long history in Toronto. Fifteen times Varsity has held sole possession of the trophy.

As with men's basketball, Varsity women won the Intercollegiate Basketball trophy the first year it became available — in 1921. The format then was for the basketball team to play exhibition matches in December, January and most of February, then participate in a tournament at the end of February or early March to decide the champion. (That system was replaced in 1970 by a regular-season and playoff structure).

The first tournament was held in 1921 at Kingston where Queen's, McGill and Varsity competed in a round-robin series. Varsity won the championship by virtue of a 32-28 win over McGill and 29-24 conquest of Queen's.

The team was led by forwards Dorothy Trapp and Margaret Burrige, with Grace Stuaholme and Muriel Asner at centre, and Molly Donaldson and Phyllis Young on defense. The forwards did all the scoring, because rules stated that only forwards could score baskets. Guards could shoot and provide rebounds for their forwards, but any score by a guard would be disallowed! (That rule wasn't changed until 1967, when men's rules were adopted and any player on the court was allowed to score).

Excellent Sportsmanship

The Varsity reported that "all was roses" during the girls' first tournament.

"Words are inadequate to express the wonderful time the Varsity girls had in Kingston. Queen's were most hospitable and billeted the Varsity girls in one of their residences commonly called the "Hen Coop". . . excellent sportsmanship was displayed during the contest. Such an event does much to augment a cordial intercollegiate feeling in girls' sports as well as being an excellent opportunity for the girls to see a little of the life at another University."

In 1922, the tournament shifted to Toronto's Hart House and for the second consecutive year, Varsity won. A sub-headline in The Varsity read: "Girls in Big Bloomers Too Much for Attractively Clad McGillites" and described the game as "... one of the most spectacular exhibitions of exciting play ever witnessed here. The spectators were kept on tiptoes all the time, while McGill and Varsity girls battled for victory." Varsity won, 42-32, with Margaret Burrige scoring 22 points for the champions.

The championship was wrested away from Varsity in 1923 but it was won back in each of 1924 and 1925. Under coach Hec Creighton, Varsity won the 1925 championship in overtime.

Varsity also won championships in 1927 and 1929. Six times in the first decade of women's intercollegiate basketball, Varsity were champions. The 1929 team won the championship game by an astounding score of 52-19 over Western, led by Eleanor Sedgewick's 22 points and another 16 by Louise Crouch. Wilma Hazlett was the captain.

The 1930's produced another five championship teams for Varsity. From 1930 to 1932 Varsity successfully defended its championship three times, making a string of four consecutive championship seasons, beginning in 1929.

More Success

After winning the championship in 1931, the Varsity reported:

"For the third year in succession the Varsity women's intercollegiate basketball team brought back the Bronze Baby from the tournament in Kingston. The team deserves great credit for their showing this year, and in the championship game against Western gave one of the finest exhibitions of basketball seen for some time."

Before competition was suspended during World War Two, Varsity won championships in 1934 and 1939. Following the Second World War, Varsity won championships in 1947, 1949 and 1950.

"Better Halves Win — Bring Back Bacon for Second Year" was the Varsity Banner after the 1950 championship season. In the round-robin tournament that year at McGill, Varsity won the championship by virtue of their tie with McGill and defeat of both Queen's and Western.

Championships were won again in 1953 and 1954 as the team was led by Joan Mooney, Carol Dobson and Sallie Wallace, who remained with the team for six years and captained it to its 1957 championship season.

In the 1957 championship tournament, the forward line of Wallace, Doris Kerr and Mary Foster sparked Varsity to a 46-37 triumph over the University of Western Ontario. Other stars of the tournament, held at Hart House, were Jean Wills and Sylvia Kerr.

But the "Bronze Baby" didn't "return home" again until 1969 when Varsity, McMaster and Western shared in the triple championship. One of the players on that team was the Blues' current coach Sharon Bradley.

"The Bronze Baby is an old trophy and falling apart anyway, so when they made the presentations, they put a rose in the cup, then separated the base, gave the base to one team, the cup to another, and we got the rose!"

Bradley is hoping that the "Bronze Baby" will return to the U of T this season. Led by league-leading scorer Barb Grochowski and Sharon Kosmachuk, and teammates Kathy Heather, Karen Pim, Janet Carson, Sandy Turney, Jane Leuty and Karen Zellen the team promises to give it their "best shot."

Sue Fountain (24), Mary Wilson (50) and Joy Mahood (42) played for Varsity in 1961-1962.

Men - since 1893

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

"Basketball seems to be an even more vigorous game than Rugby. Last week Mr. Orton received an ugly cut in the forehead and now Mr. Craig is nursing a badly sprained finger. An exciting game was played on Friday evening between a Varsity team and the YMCA. Of course, Varsity was victorious, the score standing 2-1."

— The Varsity,
January 25, 1893

had "cheated" they way to victory. "During the first half Queen's did considerable roughing it, which the referee let pass unnoticed, and managed to pile up a score of 22 to 11 against the Varsity squad. At halftime the Toronto boys raised a strenuous kick for better work on the part of the officials, and the result was a much faster and cleaner game in the last half, when most of the scoring was done by the visitors."

The Early Years

Varsity's first home game was a success as McGill was beaten 24-20. Varsity ended their maiden season with two wins and two defeats, as did Queen's and McGill. No system of breaking that tie was devised, and as a result, no winner was declared. The star of that first team was forward Marsh Whyte who became captain the following season.

The 1908-09 season produced the Inter-collegiate Basketball League's first champion, and Varsity walked off the court with the Wilson Cup, emblematic of inter-collegiate basketball supremacy. With Whyte, centre Charlie Gage, and guards Duff Wood and "Reddy" Dixon, the team was a success. As the Varsity reported, "they certainly deserve their 'T's'" (awards given for athletic excellence at U of T).

In 1909-10, a new "freshman" rule prohibited first year men from playing with the Senior team. As a result, the Intermediate team was entered in the Senior City League against strong outfits from the Central and West End YMCA. A Junior team was formed shortly after. (Although the Junior team folded before the Second World War, the Intermediate team remained in competition until the late 1950's.)

In the fall of 1910, Duff Wood was elected captain and early in 1911, for the first time in Toronto's basketball history, the team travelled to the United States to play American teams under American rules. Varsity met with mixed success.

The first U.S. games

Toronto defeated the Niagara Falls YMCA 45-29 and Buffalo's Lafayette High School 42-21, but lost some lopsided matches to stronger teams. Rochester University claimed a 37-25 win. Varsity lost 38-33 to Potsdam Normal College, 38-27 to St. Lawrence University at Canton, Ohio, and 53-25 to the Ogdensburg 40th company of New York, a regimental team.

After the Rochester game. The Varsity reported:

"The game was remarkably fast, and though rough, was an excellent exhibition of the great indoor game. Our lettergram from the team says that Toronto excelled in combination and shooting, but that strange rules as to dribbling the ball were a severe handicap."

But Varsity earned the respect of many Americans for their play. The Rochester Democrat admired Varsity because "seldom has more sportsmanlike conduct been seen on a local floor. The Toronto players played for the sport, not with the mere idea of winning. On several occasions a Toronto man stopped to beg a Rochester player's pardon for accidental smashes. Such conduct is rarely seen in our American athletics."

In the spring of 1911, Varsity won their second league championship and it proved to be their final victory before the First World War. League play was halted from 1915-19 because of the hostilities in Europe.

The first full season after the war, 1919-20, produced Varsity's third championship. Captained by their high-scoring centre Kenner Bell, Varsity tied McGill for the league lead, then beat the Montreal-based team in a playoff. Al Dixon was Varsity's coach.

Two of the strongest basketball teams this university has produced were the 1928 and 1929 squads coached by John McCutcheon. The team was led by captain Johnny Murray on defense, and paced by the high-scoring forward line of R.M. Mitchell, R. Beaton and W. C. Newman.

The '30's-Continued Success

During the Depression decade of the 1930s, Varsity won championships in 1935 and 1939. In 1935, their record was an impressive 15 wins, with only one defeat. In 1939, there was a three-way tie for the championship between Toronto, Western and McGill. Everyone expected the tie would be broken, but because of final examinations, no playoff occurred.

The same thing happened in 1940 when the Intermediate and Senior teams coincidentally shared titles with Western in their respective league.

Following that season, as a result of a Universities' agreement and Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) ruling, intercollegiate competition was suspended during World War Two.

A 1960 game against Queen's at Hart House. Note the spectators seated on the track above the playing floor. Ties customarily were worn to games.

There has only been one championship team since World War Two. The 1957-58 edition of the Blues defeated McMaster Marauders 87-71 on March 5, 1958 to win their ninth championship, and first in 17 years. The team was coached by John McManus, who has held the coaching reins from 1955 to the present day.

The Varsity headline following that victory screamed "CHAMPIONS" and remarked that "the day the basketball trophy arrives will be unforgettable. Most of the UTAU staff have never seen it."

Stars of that team included forwards Hesh Rotman, Rolly Goldring and Dave McGaughey, centre Al Vaichulis, and guards Don Lipke, Curt Russell (who was also captain of the 1958 championship football team), Ruby Richman and George Stulach.

The '60's-Blues sing the blues

Stulach was an "exceptional athlete" according to Blues' publicity director Paul Carson. "He played every position on the basketball court and he played every sport in sight except hockey." Stulach was drafted by Toronto Argonauts of the CFL, although he never played for Argos.

In the 1960's, Blues were led by guards Bruce Dempster, Dave West and Peter Potter, as well as centre John Hadden. Those players contributed fine two-way performances for the Blues, but unfortunately the team did not fare well in the standings. West set a team career scoring record with 981 points for the Blues between 1960 and 1965.

In 1971, the Blues moved out of Hart House (which had been their home court from 1908 through 1970) to play their home games at York University.

According to McManus, the Hart House facilities were "plain lousy." He said the floor was ten feet narrower and twenty-two feet shorter than a regulation-size basketball court. As well, he claimed that the lighting was poor, and that the home facilities were an immense disadvantage for the team.

"When we went on the road and played on regulation-size basketball courts, we were badly defeated. There was no way we could get into proper shape, practising on such a small court."

Since 1973, the Blues have played most of their home games at the Benson Building (originally designed exclusively for women's athletics). This past season, for the first time, Blues have been using the Benson Building as their full-time home court. In McManus' view, this has improved the team.

"Now that we're practising and playing in the same building, that's improved our team. Before we had full-time use of the Benson Building, we practised there and played our home games elsewhere. That was like playing every game on the road."

In 1973-74 Blues finished first in the Eastern Division with a record of 12-2 and lost a thriller to Laurentian, 73-72, in the quarter-final. The Blues were paced by high scoring forwards Glenn Scott and Brian Skyvington.

McManus said that the 1977-78 edition of the Blues are a young team that will improve with experience. He noted that centre Randy Cook led the league in rebounds last year as a first-year player.

Asked about the team's chances of success this year, McManus said, "We should grab one of the four playoff spots. If we don't we have no one to blame but ourselves, because we've got the talent."

Led by Cook, and guards Doug Fox and Tim McGhie the 1977-78 edition of the Blues promise to provide some exciting times ahead for basketball fans.

A game against Western in the late '50s. Poor attendance plagued the Blues.

team could travel with the hockey team and play its matches the day following hockey exhibitions.

The Varsity heartily praised the introduction of regular league basketball at the U of T: "Basketball is late in being introduced here, considering its popularity at other universities, especially in the United States, but it has already secured a firm foothold and ought to prove a huge success here. Let us but have the hearty support of the student body and Varsity though young at the game is bound to bring one more Intercollegiate championship home."

Varsity's first-ever league game was played at Queen's University in Kingston; the team lost 32-31. The Varsity reporter felt that Queen's

But the Varsity pointed out one problem which has been chronic with the basketball team: lack of fan support. The championship game with Queen's had been played at Hart House, but "As usual, the crowd was very small, even the Queen's team having as many supporters as Varsity."

The Varsity didn't help things: an article announcing Varsity's first basketball championship was buried on page three, in an era when football and hockey scores (win or lose) were front page headlines.

In 1908 the Sifton Cup was presented by the Honourable Clifford Sifton, Minister of the Interior in the Laurier cabinet, to be awarded to the basketball team with the best interfaculty record at U of T.

review

We're happy to report today that Andrew Mahon, last week's injured journalist, is back on the streets again. Welcome home.

Anyway, we just had a tough hockey game and a few beers and we've been remembering our pasts. Yes, we've been rapping. Arthur is thinking about going after a mysterious woman. Paul won't go after anyone who's under the age of seventeen. John, well you should've asked that woman to take off her sweater. Neil still can't write Lou Reed reviews. And Steve, well soft ice cream just isn't his bag. See ya, kids.

Swept away by didacticism

"I try to make films that I love or else I miss being a proselytizer for what I love. Everything else is just a falsification."

Lina Wertmüller's words flow rapidly in Italian, making it difficult for the interpreter to keep up with her. It soon becomes easy to see where the didactic inspiration for Swept Away and Seven Beauties came from. Wertmüller loves to talk politics. One gets the impression that filmmaking is secondary with the Italian dynamo and serves only as a means of visual expression for her politics.

Wertmüller's latest endeavour, The End of the World in Our Usual Bed in a Night Full of Rain is no exception. It is her first English language film and stars Giancarlo Giannini and Candice Bergen.

Giannini plays Paolo, an Italian journalist with communist and chauvinist viewpoints. He is married to an American photographer and feminist named Lizzy, played by Bergen. They are constantly at odds about love, marriage, orgasm and feminism.

Hardly subtle, the message in A Night Full of Rain is also redundant. The surface plot of the battle between the sexes, superbly depicted in Swept Away, becomes a bore. Bergen lacks the intensity of Mariangela Melatto, her bourgeois counterpart in Swept Away.

The underlying theme of society's struggle against what Wertmüller calls "alarms" hits you over the head. Glossies of Vietnam War atrocities and the 1968 student demonstration in France are plastered all over Paolo's and Lizzy's apartment. Symbolically, they clash with beautiful sepia photographs of Paolo's family.

I'm curious to know if the visual dialogue in her films is more important than their didacticism. Wertmüller tells me that she'd prefer to discuss alarms because messages alarm her. "Ecological, ideological, economic, human alarms such as overpopulation which generates violence. These may be alarms that precede a change, a mutation in the structure of society," Wertmüller links this train of thought with A Night Full of Rain.

"The title can allude literally to the end of the world or of a certain kind of world. The bed is the battle ground for male and female. This space indicates the nucleus of the family. The night of rain is a universal flood. It is a renewing cycle. Water equals the cycle of vitality."

It's obvious by now that with Wertmüller you know her films are rooted in some political philosophy, mainly her own socialism. So why are her films so popular here in this capitalist society? "No society is perfect," Wertmüller says tongue in cheek. She continued on in a more serious vein. "We have to find a new society. I think this will happen in America. Society believes more in the freedom of the individual. Exploitation of one man by another

— that's so terrible."

As well as being a socialist, Wertmüller describes herself as a dedicated feminist. This makes it even more interesting to note that she attaches the idea of the grotesque to women in her films. I suggest that in Seven Beauties Pasquillo's sisters were really seven uglies. With flailing arms Wertmüller rejects this idea. "I have other thoughts about characterization. Caricatures are more interesting. They are stupendously beautiful. My female characters have great personality," she says eyeing me from above the rim of her white-framed tinted glasses. "Each is like a goddess, beautiful like a Henry Moore."

Julian Jaynes: consciousness is destiny

THE ORIGIN OF CONSCIOUSNESS IN THE BREAKDOWN OF THE BICAMERAL MIND by Julian Jaynes. Houghton Mifflin, $12.95.

"What? Was ourself then conscious of our own beginning? That is too strong. Consciousness is a state which no one has yet attained. All that anyone has are intimations of consciousness, quick glints of light that sometimes flick through the cracks of a greater room to which we aspire. But ourself did have the precognitions and intimations that are commonly called consciousness, and did have them from the beginning."

— Arrive at Easterwine: the autobiography of a Kistec machine, as conveyed to R. A. Lafferty.

Epiktistes' feeling about consciousness corresponds closely in some ways with the ideas of Julian Jaynes.

Jaynes' thesis is that consciousness as we know it did not develop until late in man's history, about the time the Iliad subsided and the Odyssey was brought forth in Greece (the Odyssey he regards as a transitional work, showing some of the earmarks of consciousness, but still appearing to be a work of bicameral rather than conscious inspiration). The Old Testament of the Bible is seen as pointing some of the traces of this development, which is connected with the loss of the old gods. The prophets are seen as bicameral rather than conscious, and as the human race grows from bicameral into conscious thought, they are less frequently listened to as heralds, more frequently stoned. The appearance to Moses of God seen only from his backside and at considerable distance is an early instance of the retreat of bicameralism into consciousness, as is Joshua's inability always to hear the voice of God, so that in order to know how to act in certain situations he had to rely on augurs and portents rather than the commands of God in his own voice.

Now here we've jumped right into the middle of Jaynes' thesis, so we'd better go back and pursue his argument a little, in order to sort things out. Jayne argues that consciousness as we know it is a late development of the human brain, one that has grown within us steadily over the centuries and millennia, and one that to date has not entirely taken. Consciousness begins with the development of the analogue "I" of which he finds no traces in the Egyptian civilization in ancient times or even in the Mayan civilization comparatively recently when they were invaded by the Spanish conquistadores. That is to say, these civilizations and many others including the Greeks up to the time of the oral composition of the Iliad did not have the capacity to imagine themselves in any situation in which they had not previously been. Therefore they had no way of ordering and directing themselves in new and unprecedented situations by the use of imagination, and were taken over at such moments by voices coming from the right lobe of the brain, which were heard as coming from outside the brain as commands in the voice of ancestors, tribal elders, etc. — figures who were sometimes actually seen — hallucinated — and who were eventually consecrated formally as gods. It was from the commands of these voices that people made decisions and choices in new situations and not by conscious thought.

When civilizations grew too large to develop further along bicameral lines (organizational difficulties too great for a bicameral awareness to master), those which did not simply collapse began, slowly and painfully, to evolve sociobiologically a consciousness, and through generations of psychological upheaval (which seems to have corresponded in a number of instances with unprecedented topological catastrophe) people were oriented purely towards neither bicameralism nor consciousness. Through the millennia this process continued and has not been completed yet, for as Jaynes remarks at the close of his book, we all seek still the authority and certainty of the bicameral voice, and wish we could find a means to surrender consciousness and autonomy for that certainty of authority which we lack.

"The very notion of truth is a culturally given direction, a part of the pervasive nostalgia for an earlier certainty. The very idea of a universal stability, an eternal firmness of principle out there . . . is, in the morphology of history, a direct outgrowth of the search for lost gods in the first two millennia after the decline of the bicameral mind."

Coma: hospital drama dead on arrival

Coma is a curious mixture of Medical Centre and Baretta. On one hand there is the wild, playful and zany side to the hospital, such as two pathologists making out in the autopsy laboratory, and then there's an honest-to-goodness cloak'n'dagger mystery. Unfortunately the two themes never blend together satisfactorily.

Now every film buff who's seen M.A.S.H. and Hospital already know that hospitals are different from what Marcus Welby tells us. So why does director Michael Crichton bore us with 'a day in the life of a big hospital'? Arthur Hailey has already written the book on that one. If I had wanted a look at the sordid reality of the medical profession, I'd have visited Wellesley hospital. Crichton's locker room look at medicine is exceedingly tedious and Coma is saved only by the whodunnit aspect of the plot.

The film is set in a Boston hospital where there have been a growing number of unexplained comas. Young healthy people come in for routine operations and leave in a state of coma. Nobody seems to care except for one Dr. Susan Wheeler, played by Genevieve Bujold, who sets out to discover the truth behind the comas.

The investigation leads to a strange private nursing home, the Jefferson Institute. Meanwhile the authorities censure Bujold, her boyfriend patronizes her, and somebody tries to kill her.

As the mystery unfolds, Bujold is involved in several attempts on her life and here the film takes off. There's one particularly chilling chase through the morgue and autopsy rooms, complete with corpses galore. The audience loved it and went wild each time Bujold thwarted her assailant. Certainly the action sequences are the highlights of the film.

In the end, however, the answers to the mysterious epidemic of comas are quite unexciting and far from satisfactory. The build-up is fine, but the climax is horribly weak. All that is left are a few twists of the plot and several suspenseful chases.

Director Crichton is a man who has made enough money as a hack novelist to become a film director. His one credit to date is Westworld, a celluloid nightmare. Behind the cameras Crichton is nothing to write home about. He moves the camera around far too much and his treatment of the one love scene betrays as much subtlety as a floor wax commercial. The man is the Eric Segal of science-fiction and he's not much better as a film director.

Genevieve Bujold is superb as the young doctor, whether she's in the operating room or relaxing at a dance class. The French-Canadian actress manages to demonstrate her sizeable acting talent in a role that could have been written for a Dallas Cowboy cheerleader.

Elizabeth Ashley is devastating as the enigmatic nurse at the Jefferson Institute; she never seems to blink. Rip Torn co-stars in three scenes and shows he's perfected his sneer. Finally there's Richard Widmark who plays the chief surgeon. Widmark has been in the cinema for over thirty years now and had the distinction of winning an Oscar nomination for his first film. On the basis of his performance here, he should have quit while he was ahead.

One thing to be grateful about is that there's no moralizing over what society should do with coma victims. The simplistic Crichton could never have handled that and so fortunately he treats the subject in a cold and clinical manner.

The film has been receiving extensive coverage from the media and United Artists is anticipating considerable box-office success. Such massive hype is always a bad sign. For a two-hour film, Coma is one hundred minutes too long.

So what can you say about a film which, according to the press kit, was filmed in such exotic locales as a Boston subway station and a "downtown motel"? What can you say about a film about doctors that features three doctors in small roles as doctors?

Ultimately all that's left are Genevieve Bujold, two chase sequences, and a scary set at the Jefferson Institute. If you want thrills'n'spills, check out a Brian de Palma film instead.

Pinter plays hard to get

Harold Pinter's Old Times was first presented in 1971 and soon became justifiably recognized as perhaps the finest work of one of the world's most important contemporary playwrights. Now, almost seven years after its original production, the play is making its Toronto debut under the modest billing, 'Pinter's most mature comedy'.

The play takes shape around a power struggle that emerges when Kate and Deeley, a middle-aged couple, open their home to Anna, Kate's roommate and sole companion from twenty years past. Anna and Deeley launch into a heated contest to gain exclusive claim to Kate, in which language and memory become vehicles for gaining an advantage.

Kate presides over these confrontations with imperturbable detachment; she has the capacity to either perpetuate or terminate the futile competition between the other two and she ultimately exercises this power by deanimating Anna and reducing Deeley to broken submission. As in much of Pinter's work, games and conflicts of characters are comically intoned until their destructive effects become realized.

Old Times defies being placed in any naturalistic context and can be perplexing to a reader trying to impose a definable framework on it, but in performance the complexities of structure become expressively clear. Anna's existence is indeterminate and indications are that she is not a bona fide character but rather is a mutual fabrication in the minds of Kate and Deeley. Furthermore, the decisive predominance of the withdrawn domesticated Kate over the more assertive Deeley seems feasible only in an imaginary plane, suggesting that the entire play represents something conceived in Kate's mind.

The major problem of staging Old Times at the Phoenix Theatre is that two-thirds of the audience is confined to a lateral view of the playing area — an impossible situation for a relatively static play. For those in the centre section of the audience, the simple choreography and lighting effects vividly convey the play's different levels of imagination. For those watching from the side, the view is creditably unobstructed, but the effect is drastically reduced.

In all other respects the production is commendable. The three performers show an understanding of their characters, a sensitivity to the pacing of Pinter's dialogue, and a capacity for projecting unstated innuendos and allusions of words. Particularly impressive is the portrayal of Kate by Judy Leigh-Johnson who subtly reveals predominance through an externally unimposing attitude.

Summarily, the Phoenix production of Old Times marks the long-awaited opportunity for Toronto audiences to see this excellent play. Several moments of the production manage to capture the play's potential effects and these moments make it well worth seeing.

Late nite lunacy

Stand-up performance is alive and well, though relegated to upstairs rear, at the Tarragon Theatre. Each night this week, following St. Carmen, Tony Molesworth and Tony Kosinec take the stage for two hours of neurosis, music, ventriloquism and humour. The Midnight Opera, albeit rough at the edges, projects vitality and sensitivity and (at last) fulfills my expectations of cabaret theatre that has the guts not to be 'safe'.

Ambience is often the key-note of successful humour, and the converted rehearsal space with informal, cramped seating is relaxed and convivial. Molesworth, who juggles and throws his voice, is the tall one; Kosinec, who sings, the short. Tony and Tony have good routines — the humour not always brilliant but good-natured and delivered with fine balance. Kosinec is at his best when describing his pubescent summer holidays and an unexpected acid trip. Molesworth in a modernized Aesop's fable concerning the parts of the body. The leitmotif seems to be the Time-Life Home Psycho-Therapy records, which recur throughout the show and are, of course, taped responses to the patient's ramblings; they stand neatly for the precarious sanity Molesworth and Kosinec are presenting through their show. The Midnight Opera is merely insane — in all the healthy ways.

Reviewing is an arbitrary business, and the reviewer risks his credibility each time he writes. Commenting on humour is even more risky, but I'd like to recommend this performance. It's unpretentious, very funny in places and not at all slow. Two dollars and you can brown-paper-bag.

Guarneri plays it cool

Almost unheralded, the Guarneri String Quartet crept into town last Saturday night to take part in the current Mozart Festival series at Castle Frank High School. Their brief visit afforded a rare chance to hear this world-class chamber ensemble, performing music very much to their taste.

You can't fault the organizers of this series for being conventional in their programming, for again there were two unfamiliar items. First came an early quartet in C, K.157, written at a time when the quartet form and Mozart were both finding their way. It is in three movements and along Italian lines, but already it shows some of Mozart's later manner in its lyric tone and its gravity. To this second quality the Guarneri weren't as alert as they might have been, playing a bit stiffly until the pathos of the Andante second movement invited them to unbend. Polished off with a Presto finale, the performance certainly made a good case for resurrecting the piece.

By contrast, the quartet in G Major, K. 387, the first of the set dedicated to Haydn, comes from Mozart's maturity. The Guarneri recorded the work not so long ago, and it was clear that their interpretation was well thought out. In general their approach was both lyrical and reserved, and did not, for instance, stress the contrasting dynamic markings in the Allegro first movement. That was their way: a dreamlike or sublime equanimity, which rendered all the more dramatic the fugal finale — a shot in the bowing arm. It was unorthodox, but made beautiful sense. Their shaping of phrases and their ornamentation (e.g. the trills) were an object lesson, and though it is invidious to single out any one member of such an ensemble, I was especially taken with John Dalley's second violin, those contributions I thought especially apt and musically.

Clarinetist James Campbell joined the quartet for the second half, beginning with an Allegro in B Flat, a fragment from a larger work now lost. It made an agreeable impression, but it functioned really as prelude to the main work, the Quintet in A, K.581, called Stadler's Quintet in honour of Mozart's clarinetist friend. Again the approach was cool rather than amiable. Talented as he is, James Campbell sometimes seems to lack a certain musical and stage 'presence', and I wondered if the Guarneri would take advantage of his unassertiveness. In fact things went perfectly, the Quartet a sensitive foil to Campbell's refined playing, which achieved a rapt concentration in the second movement — the highpoint of an excellent concert.

Flutist blows mellow

St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church was the ideal setting for the concert last Thursday by Michel Debost, flutist, and the French String Trio. The atmosphere of the old church, warm and dignified, harmonized perfectly with the program of the chamber group in what turned out to be a very mellow afternoon of music.

The concert began with a little-known work, the Quartet in B Flat Major, Op. 22, No. 1 By Giovanni Viotti. This graceful eighteenth century work contains some beautiful melodies, though it lacks emotional substance. The clear, bell-like quality of Debost's tone was well suited to the delicate beauty of the quartet. The sensitivity and precision of the performance imparted to the audience a sense of intimacy with the music. This intimacy is what chamber music at its best should achieve.

The Viotti was followed by the Serenade in G Major of Max Reger. This trio for flute, violin and viola is full of dark harmonies and expressionist elements. In contrast to the Viotti quartet, the Serenade has emotional content, but the complexity of the music makes the emotional message rather obscure. Though unfamiliar to twentieth century audiences, Max Reger was very respected in turn-of-the-century Vienna as a composer of chamber works, piano works and organ choral fantasies. His work is being rediscovered today and there may be a Reger revival in the making.

Having filled the first half of the program with two little known compositions, presumably to take advantage of the audience's initial freshness and receptivity, the second half featured two old favorites: Beethoven's Trio Serenade in D Major, Op. 15, and Mozart's Quartet in D Major K.285. The Beethoven got off to a cool start, the Entrata being performed in a rather businesslike manner, but by the second movement of this six movement work the playing picked up energy. The trio got bogged down in the fourth movement, as the repetition became dull. Overall, however, the performance was vigorous and convincing.

The Mozart flute quartet which followed was impressive. Michel Debost's playing was superb. He has at his command a clear mellow tone and a flawless technique which he wields with sure musical sense. It is difficult to imagine a flutist with greater finesse. These virtues, together with the fine ensemble playing of the Trio gave the Mozart a luminous quality. The flute solo of the second movement was particularly compelling.

Irish rockers alienate roots for U.S. market

There is something to be said about the value of lyrics. Words are a constituent part of most popular music, even when those words are merely monosyllabic commands to shake this or that portion of the anatomy, or exhortations addressed to little birds seeking a haven above the clouds. There is a degree of truism in this. After all, where would Bob Dylan's exercises in quarter-tonal breathing be without those deep incisions into the 'wound of reality' which are the burden of his yodels and serve as grist for the infernal mills of young English professors desperately snuffling after a theme?

Another school of thought does exist. This department has an occasionally spoken policy to concentrate on the music, on the grounds that rock lyrics are generally rendered puerile by print. And, anyone who has written out the lyrics of 'C'est la Vie' can nod sagely.

And how many times have we wished that those stupid words weren't in the way of that first-rate melody, or vice versa?

These maunderings are the result of several times through the new album by Horslips — Aliens. Horslips are a band from the Irish Republic whose roots drive deep into that country's folk traditions. In the past they have employed those traditions as the basis of their music and have drafted traditional literary sources such as the Tain as a frame for their lyrics. Aliens is the second in a projected series of albums dealing with the history of the Sons of Mil from the time (325 BC) when they inherited the island from the legendary first-dwellers. The Book of Invasions brought us up past Cromwell, and Aliens takes on the period of the potato famine in the 1840's.

The famine resulted in the first wave of Irish immigrants to America, and that experience is the album's subject. It opens with the fog-horns of New York harbour and takes the migrants from Ellis Island to the promised land of Success.

Fine and good. The subject is worthy, and is undertaken with sympathy, and as much intelligence as we can expect from a rock band. Unfortunately the music just doesn't cut it. It may be that as a mirror to the deracinating effects of the American experience, the band felt it must turn its back on its musical traditions and what they can do best. They attempt to sound like an American boogie band, and end up sounding, at best like a second-rate Jethro Tull imitator, and at worst like that other pseudo-American Dublin outfit, Thin Lizzy.

It's not offensive, but it's radio music; fine when you flip on the FM while eating breakfast but not the sort of thing you'd ever listen to by conscious choice. Aliens may well break open the North American market for them but, as they know, success the American way doesn't come cheap. Let's hope they make lots of money, and head back, clutching their pots of gold, to their roots when they take on Parnell and the Easter Rising.

Beethoven warm at Hart

The atmosphere of the Great Hall in Hart House has always been conducive to the enjoyment of an evening of music, and Saturday night's concert featuring the chamber music of Beethoven was no exception. The concert was the first in a series of six presenting the complete sonatas for violin and piano, cello and piano and incidental piano works performed by violinist Otto Armin, Cellist Tsuyoshi Tsutsumi and pianist Elyakim Taussig.

Faced with a program including such diverse works as the Seven Variations on "God save the King" and the G Minor Cello Sonata Op. 5, No. 2, the audience was deftly led from the humorously ironic to the deeply contemplative. Taussig's witty playing of the "God save the King" variations couldn't but elicit at least a smile at the recognition of fragments of this well known hymn in some of its more daring contortions.

Tsutsumi impelled every note of the Sonata in G Minor to breathe with musicality through his sensitive rendering of line and colour.

Despite this, however, there could have been more advantage taken of the contrasts between the movements, especially between the opening Adagio and Allegro, and the closing Rondo could well have ended with more spirit. Whether because of the acoustical difficulties of the Great Hall or the performance itself, this and the Rondo in G Major for violin and piano both sounded rather low-key, with the musical effects of the performers seeming to float above the heads of the audience rather than project into it.

Otto Armin returned in the second half to play the Sonata No. 3 for violin and piano. Although he performs with a great deal of style, the sonata nevertheless appeared rather stiff in his hands at times. The second movement Adagio could have been more lyrical, with a greater singing quality and feeling of line in the piano as well as in the violin. Especially disconcerting were some bass rumbles in the piano at the beginning of the movement. Despite such details, however, the program closed in fine spirit, leaving the audience to look forward to the remaining concerts of the series.

"Fat is more beautiful. It is a sickness in our society to think thin is beautiful. Curves are great symbols. Thinking thin is a mania of our society leading us to impotence." With a mischievous gleam in her eyes, Wertmuller turns to Giannini who is accompanying her on the promotional tour for A Night Full of Rain.

Giannini, a passive spectator at the interview up to this point answers the charge. "It would be terrible to go to bed with a Henry Moore." He turns to Wertmuller. "I'm always going to bed with Moores in your films." Wertmuller responds, saying old men and fat men are sexy. Some of her favourites? "Fellini, Rossellini, Orson Welles." She turns serious once again.

"To be very beautiful or to lead a very rich life is very hard. If you see a beautiful woman you think that she's there for a decoration. A beautiful woman has to prove that she's interesting. It helps to be slightly unbeautiful."

A Night Full of Rain is full of allusions to other films. The influence of Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris is particularly interesting. "After all, wasn't the film's title at one time Perhaps, Perhaps, Perhaps It's All Marlon Brando's Fault?" This doesn't fare well with Lina Wertmuller. She seems annoyed at that particular connection. She raises a dismissing hand.

"That title was made jokingly. There is no connection at all. I like Tango but I like The Conformist the best. I'm a socialist and I'm much closer to the people. That's different from being an intellectual like Bertolucci. He's a great poet of certain existential stuff but not of a popular philosophy. I feel I am. It's my mission to be. I want peasants to understand my arguments and I work to that end."

A Night Full of Rain is a deluge of clichés. It's unfortunate that a filmmaker of Wertmuller's brilliance and stature doesn't seem to have the courage to explore new themes other than that of men versus women, capitalism versus socialism, which should have been put to rest with Swept Away.

A selective sketch of the next two weeks; tomorrow at 8:30 in Massey Hall, Yehudi and Hepzibah Menuhin play Elgar, Beethoven, and Bach. Harpsichordist Greta Kraus and flutist Tobert Altlin are at the St. Lawrence Friday. It only costs a buck to hear the U of T Concert Choir that evening in the EJB. Saturday evening, cellist Yo-Yo Ma plays Britten, Beethoven, and a transcription of Brahms's Op. 108 in the MacMillan Theatre. Tickets are $4 and $7.

Andrew Davis and the TSO return to Toronto with Mozart's Concerto for Two Pianos in E flat, K. 365 and Mahler's Fifth. Soloists are Christoph Eschenbach and Justus Frantz, February 14 and 15 at 8:30, Massey Hall. February 17, the New Chamber Orchestra finishes its season with the Handel "Water Music", Haydn, and some disputed Mozart.

On the eighteenth Russian-born Israeli pianist Yefim Brodman plays Beethoven, Berg, and Chopin at the St. Lawrence. $4.50 and $5.50. The following afternoon at three, some of the Faculty's best musicians — Fenyves, Odoff, Parr, Roslak and Uri Mayer — offer an interesting chamber program of Schumann, Beethoven and Shostakovich. Walter Hall, students $3. Also at 3:00, Massenet's seldom-staged Don Quichotte can be heard in concert at the St. Lawrence Centre. A repeat performance with different leads starts at 8:30 Feb. 20.

Violinist Kyung-Wha Chung plays the Elgar concerto with the TSO Feb. 21 and 22. Other works are Stravinsky's Wind Symphony on Sibelius' Fifth. Also on the 21st, Norman McBeth, Trinity's resident organist, plays in Trinity Chapel at 8 pm.

Today at Hart House, Jack Pollock will speak about the art of gallery owning or the gallery of art owning at 7 PM in the Bickersteth Room. Either way, this Art Market Series is trying to stifle the inherent greed behind the topic of treating art as a commodity. Art Gallery director Joan Murray will lead the Feb. 22nd seminar in the fourth of six discussions.

Campus galleries have colour in the offing with Ron Baker's paintings at Hart House, Charles Pachter's lithos and posters at Victoria College's New Academic Building (including his famous "Queen on Moose" and "Basic Moose") till Friday, and Islamic textiles at Scarborough College till Feb. 13. And for those with personal prowess, the St. Mike's art contest closes on Friday, accepting submissions in each of the mediums of painting, graphics, sculpture, film, and photography.

The AGO turns into an 'Acrostik Land' on weekends, so if you want to see the Lawren Harris show in a superior setting, try a mid-week afternoon sometime before the exhibition closes on Feb. 26. This Sunday the 19th century Canadian watercolours exhibition closes, and next Sunday, the 19th century British watercolours (including Blake, Constable, and Turner) moves on, along with Michael Mitchell's photographic display called Nightlife. It all sounds dismal, but the Inuit Print opens on Feb. 18 to fill in the gaps with something in the neighbourhood of one hundred and fifty Eskimo prints. Till April Fools' Day.

Nobody's answering their phones or sending me any information. If you want some dead silence on your phone line call the Ontario Film Theatre. If you want to know what's going on at Cinema Lumiere you'll need a pack of Tarot cards. And the New Yorker is planning to inflict the Rocky Horror Picture Show on us from now till September.

Otherwise things are awful. Tonight: The Science Centre has something called Ocarato and Suzuki (maybe). OISE has a bunch of Buster Keaton's. The Revue offers Bergman's light stuff with Tinsel and Sawdust and The Seventh Seal.

Thursday: More Bergman at the Revue with the heavies, Wild Strawberries and Smiles of a Summer Night. OISE has the best and longest show in town in L'Amour Fou (which weighs in at four hours and twelve minutes). The Science Centre has Tales of Hoffmann.

Friday: Finally the boys at U of T Films have come up with something to amuse and delight the boys in the review department. It's hot stuff with Emmanuelle and Shampoo. Wow-see. The Science Centre does its level best to compete in showing Flesh and Fantasy, which probably is not as much fun as it sounds.

Saturday: The Revue starts a weekend of Edvard Munch. U of T repeats and Cinema Gratis has Casablanca and Play It Again Sam, originality: triumphant once more.

Sunday: AGO has something melodramatic. Innis has cartoons and then Keaton. This is getting to be overexposed.

Monday: The Revue starts three days of two Ken Russell classics Women in Love and Valentino.

Tuesday: Somebody's probably showing something somewhere. Seems likely, don't it?

Wednesday: OISE has Rashomon and Death By Hanging.

Thursday: Is blank and empty and probably full of woe.

Friday: U of T Films has far to go, and they haven't come as far as this office. Maybe they're off learning how to read.

Saturday: Cinema Gratis is footloose, fancy free, wacky, zany, and madcap with the Brothers Marx in Night at the Opera and Day at the Races (in more ways than one — don't let the Committee on Racism catch you crying . . .)

Sunday: Innis has more cartoons and more Keaton. Gee and golly gosh. The Revue has Truffaut and kiddies with the Wild Child and Small Change.

Monday: More Bergman at the Revue in Shame and The Passion of Anna. Take along a good book.

Tuesday: Who knows, who cares.

Wednesday: OISE had women, contemporary situations and a truckload of interminable angst with Woman Under the Influence and Good Riddance. The Revue, on the other hand, has Visconti and the decay of the west with The Stranger and Death in Venice.

Thursday: OISE finishes off this exercise in tedium with one of their own. Why on earth would anyone resurrect the melodramas of Douglas Sirk? Why ever, let's hope it doesn't happen often. In the meantime we can all weep our ways through Imitation of Life (with Lana Turner and Sandra Dee) and The Magnificent Obsession (featuring another imitation of acting by the immortal Rock).

Well that's reading week so I'd recommend a good lamp, a comfy chair, and two bales of Rosemary Rogers. Or maybe a one-way ticket to Trenton N.J.

Tonight spring is rushed into Toronto with the flick of a wand. The National Ballet of Canada begins its mammoth season with the equally mammoth staging of Sleeping Beauty as envisioned by Rudolph Nureyev. Performances Feb. 8 to 11 at 8 p.m. Matinee Feb. 11 at 2 p.m.

Fund raising night with three guests and the premier of Frederick Ashton's The Dream. Feb. 15 at 8 p.m.

The remainder of reading week features Ashton's beautiful comedy L'Ille Mal Gardée. Feb. 16 at 8 p.m. Matinee Feb. 18 at 2 p.m. Then beginning Feb. 22, The National performs Erik Bruhn's version of Swan Lake.

Ticket prices range from $4.50 to $17.50 and information as to who is dancing the lead role on any particular night, can be obtained by calling the O'Keefe Centre box office at 366-6633.

For newcomers to the ballet, the new duo of Vanessa Harwood and Peter Schaufuzz is highly recommended. However Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn do remain excellent.

Sunday between 2:30 and 5:30 p.m. the Ontario region of the Dance of Canada Association is having a fund raising party at 15 Dance Lab, 155A George St. The Globe's Larry O'Toole, the Star's Bill Little plus Michael Crabbe and Susan Cohen have all been asked to perform. The $5 admission you also get a video presentation, raffles and refreshments. The money goes to help the Ontario region stay alive to mount future dance workshops and print their newsletter.

From Feb. 26 to March 3, St. Michael's College will be staging a Visual Arts Week. Organizing Chairman Frank Beltrano envisions the week as a medium through which people can learn first hand about the visual arts.

It seems that Beltrano is hoping to create a week that is not so much academically oriented as it is rooted in practical concerns. Speakers include Arnold Edinborough, President of the Council for Business and the Arts, architect Paul Reuber on the Mayor's Commission for the Revitalization of Yonge Street, and film producers Budge Crawley and Larry Dane. This lecture series is the most formal portion of the week's events.

Most of the other scheduled activities are workshops and demonstrations that seek to involve students. Prominent artists will conduct meetings with small groups of students informally discussing, demonstrating and guiding them in the general outlines of their respective crafts.

Those participating include artists Kay Graham and Paul Fournier, James Purdie of the Globe, Norm Betts from the Sun, and various U of T faculty members including Gino Matteo of the Media Centre.

Those interested in television programming will be delighted to know that the Gene Taylor Show will be broadcast live from inside Brennan Hall Wednesday at 7:30.

Dive, Leap, Dribble... It's A Wild Whirl Of Sports

By GYLNIS PETERS

Reading Week has a way of ending with a whimper but it's definitely starting with a bang. This week-end Toronto will host two women's intercollegiate championships as well as being the site of important action in women's ice hockey and basketball.

Starting Friday at 10 a.m., U of T will be out to retain its OWIAA swimming and diving championship. Leading the Blues will be 1972 Olympian Karen LeGresley, winner of three freestyle races at the 1977

Championships, and Jane Wright, another former Olympian, and winner of eight OWIAA gold medals. Coaches Robin Campbell and Merrily Stratten will also be counting on Anne-Marie Latta, a first year student at Toronto but a veteran of international swimming, and Elaine Keith, a freestyler who transferred to Varsity this year from Waterloo.

Among the many top-level swimmers competing in the meet are Joanne Kennedy, Judy Thompson and Jill Bissett of Western; Karen Murphy and diver Laura Hecker of Waterloo; Debbie Eastmure of McMaster, Anne Merklinger of Ottawa and Chris Lovett-Doust of York, who won two events last year.

Heats commence at 10 a.m., diving at 2 p.m. and the swimming finals get underway at 7 p.m.

Led by Nancy McDonnell, competitor at the 1972 and 1976 Olympics, York University will be the team to beat in this week-end's gymnastics competition. McMaster, coached by former Olympian Lise Arsenault, has won two invitational meets this season and should give York a run for their money this year.

Coach Liz Swinton has worked hard to field a competitive Toronto team and a couple of strong performances are expected. Toronto's entry in the senior division will be Janice Davy, winner of the senior all-round title last year. Other competitors to watch for will be McMaster's Diane Chown, runner-up to Davy last year, Western's Jill Gibson and Sue Brougham and York's Kathy Morris.

The meet will be held in the Sports Gym at the Benson Building this Saturday starting at 10:15 a.m. with the Junior competition. At 1:00 p.m. the Intermediates compete and the Seniors commence at 3:15 p.m.

After their "Big Mac Attack" last Wednesday the women's ice hockey team is continuing to rise in the league. In second place now, they face a strong team from Queen's this Friday at 5:15 p.m. At this point in the season every game is important if a playoff spot is to be secured.

Although the Blues Basketball team, coached by Sharon Bradley won't make the OWIAA playoffs, the team has already improved on last year's record and was a strong contender all season. Barb Grochowski, who scored 24 points last week-end against Carleton, has been the top scorer all season. On Friday, Toronto will host Laurentian, past national champions and currently ranked number two in the country behind the Victoria Vikes. The game gets under way at 4:00 p.m.

Saturday night, the Blues entertain McMaster in their final game of the season, which gets off the ground at 8:00 p.m.

With this kind of a lineup for your week-end's entertainment, how can you miss? Come and find out what U of T intercollegiate athletics are all about, it's all at the Benson Building this week-end. We do it all for you!

Where To Go Next? M.B.A. - B.B.A.

Gryphons Bow Low To Blues

By GYLNIS PETERS

After a slow start to the season the Lady Ice Hockey Blues are wasting no time at all catching up. They dealt Guelph a solid defeat Monday night as the Gryphons suffered a 5-2 defeat at the hands of this team on the ice.

Toronto went ahead 2-0 in the first period on goals by Lynda Harley on an assist from Val Bush and Noreen Lem, assisted by Cathy Brown. Before the end of the period Guelph had come back to make the score 2-1.

Early into the second the score was tied up and then Cathy Brown went into action, putting two goals in one right after the other. Lynda Harley gave a perfect pass to Val Bush who ended the evening's scoring at 5-2. During the night Toronto had 31 shots on Guelph's net while the Gryphons returned with 29.

Coach Dave MacMaster found the Guelph squad "hard to play, because they seem to constantly get in your way." Referring to the Gryphon's style of play he called it "organized chaos." Organized in the sense that they are a hard-working team playing very disciplined hockey.

In the third period Toronto really outplayed the opposition. The depth of Toronto's bench was demonstrated as they all made an important contribution to the game. Pamela Cervinka played an outstanding game on defence, checking and penalty killing. McMaster felt that she was "the fourth person in all the plays made."

Toronto had three penalties to kill in the third period and the bench was indispensable as the first two lines definitely needed to rest. Rose Housar, Liz Novachis and Adrienne Stonowski all played extremely well. Stonowski was very effective each time she went onto the ice.

At the moment Toronto is in second place but their position is tenuous as has been the situation all season. This Friday the Blues take on Queen's at 5:15 p.m. There is still some doubt about their game against York, but it will likely take place at York on Thursday, starting at 6:30 p.m.

Blues Put Up Good Fight Against Yeomen

By CRAIG WARDLAW

The U of T men's basketball put up a valiant fight but was subdued by the powerful York Yeomen in a game at the Benson Building last night. The final score was a very respectable 72-61, considering that York is the number two ranked team in the country.

York started quickly jumping to a 6-0 lead in a matter of seconds. In this flurry the fans got a first, impressive look at York's starting centre, 6'11" Lonnie Ramati who bagged two of the initial hoops. Ramati however, also picked up two quick fouls and was removed from the game early in the half.

From this point on the game was fairly even. The Blues pulled to within 3 points but had to settle for a 12 point deficit at the half.

In the second period the Blues were more erratic in their shooting but still managed to stay in the game with some tough defensive work. In a rare York letdown they again closed the gap, this time to 5 points, but couldn't keep up the pace as they encountered serious foul problems. Three of the Blues ended with 4 fouls including centre Randy Cook.

Cook led the Blues rebounding picking off 17 and scored 16 points. Surprisingly Toronto did well overall in rebounding edging the Yeomen 57-50 in this department. Although the towering Ramati was on for less than half the game, Cook seemed to be able to hold his own when Ramati was under the basket.

York's scoring was led by a very smooth David Coulthard who hit for 23 points. Controlling the game from his guard position he gave Blues coach John McManus cause to lament "What do you do with a guy like that?" Also big for York were Chris McNeilly with 10 and Frank Zubys and Ramati with nine.

For Toronto, Cook and guard Tim McGhie had 16 apiece, Doug Fox had 12 and Joe Braunstein scored eight. Toronto's starting five had 55 of the 61 points. York showed more depth with their non-starters getting 29 points.

York shot 37 per cent from the floor compared to a respectable 36 per cent for the Blues.

McManus didn't think York were as dominating as they could have been and thought the Blues might have taken the game with better shooting, especially at the foul line.

Toronto's next home game is Saturday Feb. 18 when Carleton visits. Between now and then the Blues will face York again, Ryerson and Laurentian and will be looking for some points to grab a playoff spot.

Bohonek To Skate At U of T

By HUGH STUART

At this time of year figure skating enters the international sports spotlight. In recent years Canada has been internationally represented by such superb skaters as Toller Cranston and Ron Shaver. With the defection of both of these skaters to the professional ranks, the door has been left open for U of T's Stan Bohonek.

Bohonek is no stranger to Canadian figure skating fans. Among his list of achievements are two Eastern Canadian Senior figure skating championships, two third place finishes in the Canadian Senior Championships, and a place on the Canadian Olympic Team for the 1976 Olympics at Innsbruck, Austria.

Unfortunately, Bohonek's name will not grace the sports pages this year. Tendonitis has limited him to non-competitive skating.

Two weeks ago, he skated an exhibition at the University of Western Ontario's centennial celebrations. This Friday, at the prompting of Varsity Blues' Hockey coach Tom Watt, Bohonek will display his abilities between the first and second periods of the Blues game against Queen's (Varsity Arena, 8.30).

The Scarborough College Bachelor of Science graduate (now a special student), is thrilled to be performing in front of his peers. He explains that "Watt has been after me to do this for the past two years, but until now my competitive schedule and my studies had prevented me from taking up his offer."

For Watt, the primary reason for his request is to draw fans to the hockey game. Bohonek's motive is to increase the fan's appreciation of the 'art' of figure skating. Says Bohonek, "I'll be happy if the people come down. If they aren't already knowledgeable, I'm sure the people will learn enough to appreciate the sport."

Bohonek feels he has already made a large contribution to the artistic development of figure skating. Unlike a free form skater such as Cranston, he sees himself as a pioneer of figure skating along classical lines.

A classical style is only natural for an individual such as Bohonek. He started skating at the age of seven and studied ballet for eight years at Prague's National Theatre.

He possesses the deep artistic insight that distinguishes a world class figure skater. He explains that, "Because of the music that is involved, figure skating is really an art rather than a sport."

Music is his inspiration. His movements on the ice are a dramatization of the emotions that the music inspires in him. The figure skater tries to unite music and movement to illustrate the composer's motivation for creating the piece of music. Each jump, spin, change in speed, and change in expression represents elements of the skater's interpretation.

Bohonek has no objection to sensible modern music, but he prefers to perform to classical pieces. He explains that, "the music that inspires me the most is that of Czech composers Dvorak and Smetana. Being a Czech myself, I have a great feeling for their music."

His classical ballet training was a great aid in developing his interpretative skills. Why then did figure skating have a greater appeal than ballet? "Through gliding, jumping and spinning, there are simply a wider range of emotions that I can express on the ice rather than on a floor. Really, on ice, there are limitless boundaries," explains Bohonek.

A great figure skater has to have individuality. If anything, Stan Bohonek has that quality. His figure skating is very much an extension of his personality. As he puts it, "Although I wouldn't go so far as accepting the label of being an egotist, I have to agree that I am strongly individual. Whether it be in competition or an exhibition, I perform for the satisfaction of the fans and myself. The truth is, I love performing."

World class figure skater Stan Bohonek will be putting on a special show for U of T students this Friday.

Big Week In College Sport

By JIM O'LEARY
and HEATHER HILL

Intercollegiate teams are entering the pivotal point of their season. Before Reading Week is over, Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) playoffs will have been finalized in swimming, gymnastics, wrestling, volleyball, fencing, curling, badminton and skiing.

Here at U of T the Basketball Blues are entering the week which will determine their playoff future. Before an important game with Carleton Feb. 18 at the Benson Building, the Blues have two difficult encounters with York and Laurentian as well as an easier match with winless Ryerson next Tuesday. At present the Blues are fighting among three teams for two playoff spots. Wins over Ryerson and Carleton are essential in their playoff drive.

In hockey, the Blues have four games within a seven-day span in their quest to finish the season undefeated. They play three home games in four nights against York, Queen's and Ottawa tonight, Friday and Saturday respectively. Next Wednesday they travel to York for their last game of the regular season. The Blues have already wrapped up first place in their division and are currently rated number one in the country.

The next ten days will also be busy ones for our intercollegiate swim team. Tomorrow they meet the York Yeomen and Simon Fraser University Clansmen in dual meets at York. This will mark the first time a U of T team has swum against Simon Fraser. On February 17 and 18 the Blues will be competing in the OUAA finals in McMaster. The Blues and Waterloo are co-favourites to win.

The wrestling team will also be busy with a dual meet against York tonight, a meet against Guelph on Saturday and the OUAA finals on the 17th and 18th at York. Saturday's meeting with Guelph at Hart House could be a gauge to the Blues' chances of success in the finals since Guelph is generally conceded the top spot in Ontario.

In gymnastics, the OUAA finals will be held at York this Saturday. The Yeomen will probably win but should receive some stiff competition from the Blues.

By virtue of their impressive performance at the Sectional Finals at the Benson Building last weekend, the fencing team has advanced to the OUAA finals this weekend at Western.

The Track and Field team will be competing in the Maple Leaf Indoor Games this Friday night. As well as the top intercollegiate athletes in this field, this meet will also feature some of the best runners and jumpers in the world.

The Badminton team hopes to wrap up what has been a good season with a victory in the OUAA finals to be held this weekend in Western.

In Skiing, the team will wrap up their season with meets this weekend and the weekend following.

For sporting fans staying in the city, next week offers various opportunities to see many of the best intercollegiate athletes this province has to offer. Why not make it a point to take in some of the action?

Esson Leads Team

By DINO SRITH

The U of T women's Alpine Ski Team finally pulled themselves together this week to win the third meet of the OUSKI series. Four of six skiers made it to the bottom of the run; the first time this has happened this year.

Coach Donny Lowes was ecstatic as Andrea Esson finished first, Karen Kingsmill fifth, Kersten Schumacher 10th and Brenda Webster 15th. "Just wait 'til 1980!" said Lowes proudly.

Susan Graves and Carolyn Aguirion of Waterloo, both ex-Canadian National 'A' team members, tied for second. Esson's win, her first ever against Graves in giant slalom, puts her in second place in the series standings. Graves, who has two seconds and a first, is eight points ahead.

The race was crucial for our women's team, who had managed only a fourth and sixth so far this season. Only the top three teams in Ontario will be invited to the Can-Am meet to be held at Lake Placid in March.

Waterloo women, now in first place in the series, look like run-away winners, so the pressure is on U of T to beat out Western, Trent or Queen's for one of the other two spots. U of T is currently in third spot behind Western.

U of T men had a disappointing day as team members had difficulty getting to the bottom without stopping. Captain Mark Bell, feeling confident because his stiffest competition, David Lech of Queen's was absent, was beaten by Rob Gripper of Queen's. The course was a very easy one, causing Bell to comment "any hacker can go straight."

Grant Wilson, usually a consistent top ten finisher, skied out half way down his second run. Mike Owen, who had some very fast runs this year but has had problems keeping his skis on for two runs, overcame this problem but still finished at the bottom of the top ten.

Stephen Christie, Steve Shaver, and Karen Thompson of the women's team, all fell victim to binding problems. Rookie women's team member Eva Van Wouwe, who has been improving steadily, finished both runs without any trouble for the first time this year.

U of T men ended up third behind Queen's and York leaving them second in the series behind the invincible men's team from Queen's.

The fourth and fifth races this Thursday and Friday at Georgian Peaks should determine the series winners. Come up with SAC and cheer our team on.

Wrestlers Looking Good

By ANGELO CALLEGARI

Last weekend eight members from the U of T Wrestling team travelled south to compete in the Michigan Invitational and Windsor Open Wrestling Tournaments.

The Toronto team lacked many of its key personnel who were kept home because of injuries and academic commitments. Nevertheless, those who went performed well and coach Joe Rabel was pleased with much of what he saw.

In Michigan, the cream of the Canadian wrestling circuit competed against top American wrestlers. Competing for Toronto was Clive Llewellyn who fought well to take first place in the 167 pound class.

Another excellent performance was turned in by veteran Rob Moore who fought several tough matches including a bout against Michigan's Kiyoshi Abe who placed second in the world in 1971. Moore defeated Abe 4-2 but dropped a match to Shawn Barry to place second at the 136.5 weight class.

Jack Preobrazenski turned in a good performance at the 180.5 weight class. He placed fifth overall after losing two and winning one match by a pin.

The Michigan Invitational was somewhat of a disappointment for several wrestlers who had come expecting to see a larger field of competitors. Nonetheless, the Canadians totally dominated this American tournament.

The Windsor Open turned out to be a very good tournament. Toronto did well taking two second place finishes. Ed Rector, fighting at 190 pounds, won three matches and dropped a close decision to an opponent from Western.

Glen Wiocheyn, won two and lost a close match to a Lakehead opponent.

The wrestlers' next meet is a dual meet against York tonight.

'No' to UTFA wage hike

By KATHY CANTY

Tension between the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) and the university administration is stronger than ever now that the mediation stage of salary negotiations is over.

The mediator, Professor Dan Soberman of Queen's University law faculty, brought his report forward last week.

UTFA's major demand, a proposal for an eight per cent salary increase, was rejected. Although he felt this was a moderate demand, Soberman said it could not be granted because of insufficient government funding. Instead he proposed that the administration's offer of 3.75 per cent increase be adopted.

Soberman did, however, grant the following benefits:

- a special merit fund for tutors which would comprise 3 per cent of the global operating budget.
- an $800 salary increase for each librarian in a junior position at U of T.
- free tuition at U of T for the dependents of academic staff.
- elimination of rank salary ceilings.

Donald Chant, Vice-Provost of U of T, said the administration was prepared to accept the proposal for a special merit fund for tutors. It would not accept, however, the recommendation for free tuition for dependents. "We reject that because that would be a scholarship to people based on birth rather than ability," he said.

The administration is also unwilling to accept the proposals for an $800 salary increase for librarians, and removal of rank salary ceilings, according to Chant.

"I think the mediator did a very good job." He was complimentary to both sides, said Chant. Unfortunately the university does not have enough money to implement all of the mediators, he added. Chant blamed this on government underfunding.

UTFA president Jean Smith reacted angrily when he was told about Chant's remarks in a telephone interview last night. "I am surprised and disappointed to learn that the administration is not prepared to accept the mediator's proposals, and I would hope that this is not their final position, because it will certainly precipitate a crisis of confidence."

Smith said he was very disappointed that the mediator did not grant UTFA the salary increase it wanted. As for the other benefits he said "we got the cheapies." Smith added, however, that UTFA is prepared to accept the mediation agreement.

The refusal of the administration to accept the results of mediation challenges the validity of the Collective Bargaining Agreement negotiated between UTFA and the university last year, according to Smith. It erodes the trust upon which this agreement is based, he said.

"I am shocked and surprised that the administration would take this stand and do it at this time," said Smith.

The mediator's proposals must now be voted upon by Governing Council. If the Council rejects these recommendations the administration's offer will automatically be adopted.

Smith was asked if UTFA would unionize if Governing Council rejected the results of mediation. "I would like you to quote me as saying, no comment," he replied.

SAC fees up, '79

By GEORGE COOK

The Students' Administrative Council (SAC) has decided to ask U of T students for a four-dollar SAC fee increase to take effect September, 1979. The student body will decide in a March referendum whether or not to give SAC the extra money.

Asked why the increase would not take effect until the year after next, SAC president John Tuzyk said the Council wants to use up the remainder of a surplus made over the last several years.

"We want to use up the balance and then carry on," Tuzyk stated. SAC holds about $226,000 in the bank. This surplus is reduced to approximately $70,000 before fall fees are received by SAC in November of each year.

Over the next four years SAC plans to reduce this surplus by about $50,000. The meeting was held Feb. 10 at Erindale College. Engineering representative Tom Simpson added the issue of cutbacks in service at the university to the agenda, but the meeting ended before a discussion could take place.

University cutbacks will, however, be discussed by SAC at Wednesday's meeting.

Also on the agenda for Wednesday is a debate on a series of motions put forward for a decision by individual councils by the National Union of Students (NUS) pertaining to the status of Quebec as a nation and to the status of l'Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec (l'ANEQ) as the "national" representative of students in Quebec.

When the questions have been decided SAC's vote will be mailed to NUS where it will be tallied with votes from other councils to arrive at a NUS position on the status of Quebec and of l'ANEQ.

A SAC fee increase could help purchase more of these.

GSU threatens to discharge editor

By MARIO CUTAJAR

Freedom of the student press is once again an issue on campus after two warnings of dismissal were delivered by the Graduate Students Union (GSU) executive to Grad Post editor Maria Horvath. Details of the warnings, and the charges behind them were released by Horvath yesterday at a conference of the Ontario Region of Canadian University Press (ORCUP).

Delegates of university papers from all over Ontario were amused when Horvath gave a summary of the charges against her and her reply to them. The charges fall in three categories: editorial content of the Grad Post, the financial management of the paper and relations between Horvath and other employees of the GSU.

With regard to editorial content the GSU executive charged that Horvath has failed to publish papers of the size agreed upon when she was hired, that she has failed to cover important campus meetings and that there has been a lack of photographs in the Grad Post.

Horvath told ORCUP delegates Saturday that she has produced, with the exception of one case when she was ill, the exact number of pages as the last editor of the Grad Post. She also said her job description doesn't specify the size of papers. She also claimed that the GSU has yet to tell her which specific meetings she missed. She also said that she had attended a large number of meetings, some of them during the summer when she was not on salary. Her comment that in her reporting of these meetings she has not emphasized the contributions of the GSU executive brought forth a burst of laughter from the delegates. CUP fieldworker Bob Wakulich described the charge that Horvath has not covered enough meetings as "particularly unfair" given that Horvath is the only writer at the Grad Post and that there are fewer GSU writers than last year.

The GSU also charged Horvath with failure to prepare a budget, failure to pay outstanding debts and do proper billing and delaying the yearly audit of the Grad Post.

Horvath's reply was that she has kept to a budget, a copy of which she showed to delegates, but has not presented an official budget because she has no formal accounting skills. Moreover, according to Horvath, the GSU's treasurer has not helped her prepare one even though she requested his help. She also pointed out to ORCUP delegates that she expects a surplus this year, adding that the GSU bar and restaurant have not only failed to present a budget to council but are not even scheduled to do so at the next GSU meeting.

According to Horvath the outstanding printing debt referred to in the executive's warning of dismissal is a debt carried over from last year. Similarly, delays in auditing, according to Horvath, refer to the years 1975 and 1976 when the books were not closed. "Surely," she wrote in reply to the first GSU warning "you do not subscribe to the theological principle of original sin whereby succeeding generations are guilty of the offence of their ancestors."

The GSU also charged Horvath with breaking the Xerox machine in her office, a charge which the repairman laughed at according to Horvath.

Other charges: that Horvath broke her fellow-workers' trust by leaving open the door of the office which Professional faculties may face fee increase next year

By BLAIR HUNTER

A tuition fee increase for certain professional faculties at U of T is one step closer to becoming reality.

In a near unanimous decision Feb. 9 the Academic Affairs Committee of Governing Council approved a President's Budget Committee report which generated the motion for a fee increase from between $5 to $65 in 1978-79.

The exact amount of the tuition hike will vary depending on the particular faculty and program.

The rationale behind the increase is to bring tuition up to the fee level recommended by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

Students in the Faculties of Dentistry, Forestry and Nursing can expect a fee increase of between $10 and $45.

The Faculty of Medicine's Art as Applied to Science program and the Education Faculty's Degree, Diploma, Institute of Child Study and Summer programs are also expected to be more expensive next year.

The last fee increase was 1977's $100 across-the-board jump.

Opposition to the increase lies in the argument of Student Administrative Council representatives Michael Treacy and Brian O'Riordan.

Treacy, Vice-Chairman of Academic Affairs, appealed to the committee at the Feb. 9 meeting to persuade the university administration to maintain its resolve of standing up to the provincial government by maintaining the lower fees of past years.

At the same meeting O'Riordan said, "This increase, an attempt to maximize university revenue, is done at the expense of the student who again ends up being gouged for more money."

Academic Affairs Committee chairman Michael Bliss sees the issue in black and white terms.

"The university needs more money to maintain the quality of education. Cheap tuition means a cheap education," said Bliss.

According to Bliss, "higher tuition fees are indicative of the bind students everywhere are in."

"It is not a matter of trimming off non-existent fat from elsewhere in the university budget."

York protests 'death of quality education'

By ERIC STARKMAN

Thursday before reading week a 300-seat lecture hall at York University was inundated with angry members of the York community who were protesting a $4-million budget cutback by the Ontario government.

The rally was organized by campus groups representing faculty, students and service staff. Representing the York administration was its president, H. Ian Macdonald.

Two graduate students carried a black cardboard coffin with "Quality Education" written on its side into the hall to mark the beginning of the rally. To the chanting of "no cutbacks, no cutbacks" GAA member Mark Goldin shouted: "The provincial government and the people who support them may need burial before we do."

Harvey Pinder, a student representative on the York Board of Governors, was chairman. Speakers were allotted two minutes each to speak, with the exception of Macdonald, who was allowed five.

Don Smith, a representative from Atkinson College told the audience that the cutbacks would severely hurt the college. Louma Evans, president of York University Staff Association, stated that "York University must redefine their priorities" adding that its priorities "should be human beings, not figures on a balance sheet." She emphasized that women would be the most seriously affected.

As he stood up to address the audience Lee Lorch, president of the York University Faculty Association said, "Sometimes my classrooms look like this." He asked, "How long can we endure (the cutbacks)" and stated that if York members did not oppose the cutbacks "we shall be party to the destruction of this country."

Student council president Paul Hayden suggested some alternative measures to the proposed cutbacks. He then turned to Macdonald and said, "I hope that you force the Ontario government to re-evaluate the hatchet job on this university."

When Macdonald began to speak, the crowd for the most part remained subdued. Displaying some signs of nervousness Macdonald began his speech. "Now I know what it would feel like to be the sole penalty killer against the Montreal Canadiens." His speech, which lasted 13 minutes, dealt primarily with the economics of running a university and the various methods of handling the cutbacks. He said that the public supports education "as much as ever before" and the university must "convince the media that our problems are real." He refused to commit himself to join a proposed student march on March 16 to Queen's Park to protest government cutbacks.

In addition to the York University speakers several student leaders from other institutions endorsed the meeting. Issa Becker, president of the Ontario Federation of Students, warned that "educated people are a resource we cannot dispense with" and that "education and social services are the fundamental right of a healthy and democratic society." Steve Gelban, an undergraduate representative from U of T's GAA, told the rally he hoped that other student groups would get together to oppose the cutbacks. Later in an interview he said he was extremely impressed by the turnout and by "President Macdonald's comments and performance." He added that he doubted U of T president John Evans would attend a similar rally at U of T.

Another meeting was organized by York GAA member Eileen Crawford for this Thursday to unite people at York and carry out a strategy to fight cutbacks.

Dr. Evans admits it

By JOHN WILSON

Retiring U of T president John Evans, tired of parrying persistent Varsity enquiries concerning his probable political future with his notorious "I'd rather be a doctor" stand-up comedy routine, finally and officially revealed his candidacy for the Liberal nomination in Rosedale riding last Monday.

Evans will be running hard against declared contenders Bill Wilkerson, a vice-president for IT&T, and Anne Cools, who works with Women In Transition and is, for that traditionalist area of Toronto, unexpectedly black and political.

Evans looks to the future.

Evans' manager for the nomination manoeuvring, Joe Potts, clearly expects a close race although he is optimistic. And the riding association will close ranks behind "any of the three," he said, rejecting assertions of division and the much-publicized speculation that Cools was encouraged to run in the Broadview-Greenwood riding.

The high-visibility campaign to find a candidate has overtones of pressure politics — Evans lemporizing while lining up the support that former riding association president Wilkerson might have counted on. Hopeful Cools, noting "I was the first to declare," finds it unfortunate that press coverage, playing up the social acceptability of candidates, has emphasized "polarization" of the riding into "north and south, rich and poor. It's time to heal all wounds." She sees Evans' long delay as a marketing approach to the voter — "it's like fragrant detergent offered to an unthinking consumer."

Last night neither Evans nor Wilkerson were available for comment. But Potts, Evans' campaign manager, spoke about the likelihood of a head-on clash between his man and Tory David Crombie, whose candidacy, he thought, was almost certain: "It would be most unfortunate to pit two people of that calibre against each other."

The jockeying for position continues until the riding association meeting April 6. Meanwhile, remember that you heard it first in the Varsity.

Cruise O'Brien denounces IRA, cites Ireland's violent tradition

By KATHY CANTY

Irish Senator and scholar Conor Cruise O'Brien vehemently denounced the Irish Republican Army (IRA) in a biting commentary on Irish society and history delivered at Convocation Hall Feb. 10.

Cruise O'Brien's address came towards the end of a week-long program of lectures and concerts at U of T entitled "Canada and the Celtic Consciousness". The symposium was presented by the Canadian Association for Irish Studies and the Celtic Arts Society.

The history of Ireland's violent struggle for independence from the British Empire has bequeathed a revolutionary tradition, which has produced much of the intellectual dishonesty and ignorance found in Irish society today, he said. It is a "clammy green cloud" which pervades the Irish parliament, befuddles the media, and clogs the minds of the Irish people, he said.

Most people in the Republic today don't give a "inker's curse" about the restoration of the Gaelic language, or about the reunification of the six northern counties (which remain a part of the United Kingdom) with the rest of Ireland, he declared. Yet because of this "hollow pretense" of a revolutionary tradition, Irish spokesmen continue to uphold these aims with a "bleary righteousness."

To get a taste of this "bland impalpable cloud of unknowing" you must only look at the speeches of the Archbishop of Ireland or the Irish Prime Minister Jack Lynch, said Cruise O'Brien. "But to get the full flavor you must visit Ireland," he added sarcastically.

Cruise O'Brien also threw a few darts at Irish historiography. There was nothing romantic about the violence of the rebels of the Irish Rising, he said. But this is not "nice to think about and therefore not Irish history. I believe that the Republic of Ireland would be as free today if the Rising had never been achieved."

Irish nationalism today means dragging the farmer out of the European Common Market and dragging the television cables out of Irish homes, he stated. It also means the taking of human life in the name of one's forefathers. "Pretense is our curse," declared Cruise O'Brien. His speech ended with a plea that the Irish people discard their violent tradition and rebuild the country on a more loving basis.

With the political situation in Northern Ireland still tense, Cruise O'Brien's address was one of the most controversial speeches made at the symposium.

The aim of the symposium, according to Artistic Director, Robert O'Driscoll, was to explore Celtic myth, art and archaeology, and its connections with other cultures.

Meetings were held to examine individually the contributions of the Scottish, the Irish, and the Welsh to Canadian culture.

Both local and international dignitaries turned out in full force for the symposium. Among these were Pauline McGibbon, Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, Michael Yeats, Vice-President of the European Parliament, and son of W.B. Yeats, and Sean MacBride, Assistant Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Gov't reply to OFS protest

By CELIA RASBACH

The Ontario Government has made no conscious decision to let our post-secondary education system deteriorate, Premier William Davis told the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) at an Ontario Cabinet meeting Feb. 9.

The premier's statement was in response to Miriam Edelson, OFS chairperson, who asked whether the Government's changing policy towards issues such as student aid and differential fees showed less commitment to an "equality of opportunity" policy than in the past.

In a 107-page brief submitted to the Cabinet for discussion, OFS argued that the new Ontario Study Grant Plan, higher tuition fees, differential fees for foreign students and cutbacks will work against the Government's self-professed goal of universal access to post-secondary education. The brief also mentions the Government's lack of long range plans for the future of post-secondary education.

Davis agreed with the principle of accessible education, but his main concern was where the Government would find money for such policies. Students should realize that the Government does not have unlimited resources, he said. He invited OFS to look at the provincial budget and "tell me where to change the allocation of the tax dollar in a meaningful way."

Thomas Wells, Minister of Education, commented that the Government was already funding 80 per cent of the post-secondary system. "Can you ask the taxpayers to pay the whole shot for 16 per cent of the population?" he asked. "And if the government cuts taxes as some people have suggested, there will be even less money for education."

Keith Norton, Minister of Community and Social Services, said the Government has a responsibility to "look where the needs are in our society," rather than to channel a fixed amount of money into post-secondary education.

Norton said there are more important barriers to University than financial ones. He said some people cannot cope intellectually and emotionally with going to university. Applying funds earlier in the education of such people, could help them cope with going to university by the time they reach that level, Norton added.

Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, stated that the Government's decisions regarding eligibility periods, part-time students and the definition of an independent student will stand as announced. When asked by Edelson about the Colleges and Universities critics' claim that the parental contribution graph was ready in January, Parrott admitted that the lower and higher spectrum of the graph had been finished.

"However, the middle part of the graph causes 95 per cent of the problems, since most students fall into this area," he said. The graph is ready now but Parrott prefers to reveal the entire student aid package in March rather than revealing it "piecemeal."

Student reaction after the Cabinet meeting was less than enthusiastic. Edelson commented that "the Cabinet did not answer our recommendations to our satisfaction." John Tuzzyk, U of T student council president, said, "I think the meeting demonstrates that unless there is clear massive support from students regarding student aid and unemployment, such meetings are mere window-dressing." Both Edelson and Tuzzyk were pleased with Davis' promise of an annual meeting of the Cabinet to discuss student affairs.

Special funding ends for Ontario universities

By SEAN DUNPHY

The days of special government funding for individual projects in Ontario universities are over according to Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities. Parrott spoke on Feb. 9 at a meeting of 50 Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students (APUS) class representatives.

Parrott said that the Government is "out of the special funding business. Period." He said the Government "believes strongly in the university economy" and its right to set its own priorities. Private business and the general public will have to provide special funding for such projects as book buying for libraries and the Campus as Campus Centre project, because, he said, "if I take over, I've got to control you completely."

Parrott also denied allegations with his last meeting with students at U of T Jan. 12 that the new student aid plan had already gone to the printers. According to Parrott, the plan went to the printers Feb. 6, and he is not going to reveal any piece of the plan until he can release the whole package in March.

However, Parrott defended its formation saying that he has "fought as hard as is humanly possible for the post-secondary system in Ontario" in the Cabinet, and that he had asked for and received plenty of student input into the new plan last fall.

Despite the late date that the plan went to the printers, Parrott said that students will not suffer because of it. Applications should be ready in March and processed in time to have the cheques ready for the beginning of September, he said.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

COMMON FRONT

The letter on the anti-cutback protests at Ryerson which we print below has a tone which we have not heard for a long time. For once we don't have a complaint about student apathy. Rather we detect a note of triumph. Cutbacks are depressing but in this case they seem to be a source of exuberance.

We hear a new voice speaking here: "Students are not apathetic." What's happening? Are we going back to the sixties? No, we're heading into the eighties.

For years now the bourgeois press has been gloating over the "apathy" and careerist orientation of the present generation of students. But listen to this: "There are already signs that a new form of student unrest is brewing ominously on Canadian campuses, and not just over the dismal job prospects facing graduates but over a range of other issues, including fees that rise while academic standards decline and university facilities are cut back under the impact of financial constraints." (The Canadian supplement of the Toronto Star, Jan. 28. "Behind those shining faces".)

They're frightened. Student power, long dormant, is beginning to stir. We have an opportunity to start changing things.

The letter we referred to earlier mentions a proposed common front between York, Ryerson and U of T. York and Ryerson have started without us. It's time to start moving. The common front is the right approach because cutbacks are not directed at any specific institution but effect university education in general.

Struggle can be fun.

Hate literature

U of T may well feel embarrassed to learn of Professor Baum's incredibly stupid remarks at a recent conference on Law and Contemporary Affairs, where he suggested selective censorship of hate literature on the basis of the strength and influence of the group to which it is directed. (The Varsity, 98, 49, p. 3, 1978)

There is only a hairline distinction between the policies of permission and promotion, and historical analysis reveals many examples of their sequence. Moreover, the recipients of hate propaganda are vulnerable as individuals regardless of the strength and influence of their groups (the WASPS, Jews or Pakistanis).

As a Christian, Professor Baum must surely recognize the potency of evil in hate literature. It panders to the unfounded fears of right wing fanatics, it perverts the logic of pertinence to the illogic of scapegoat, it credits the beast impulses of uneducated hoodlums (who may even possess degrees).

The censorship of reading matter is oppressive by any standard, but its application to race hate material at least protects us from fools who, if only by default, would ignite the tinder box of racial violence.

Trotsky's attacked

I am writing in response to a letter by the Trotskyist League that was printed in your Letters and Opinions column, ("Hubie dead at last," Monday February 6, 1978).

In my opinion, the League passed unfair judgement on the late Hubert Humphrey. In accusing Humphrey of supporting injustices against civil rights, the League has overlooked the actions of their ideological founder, Trotsky was instrumental in the creation of the harshest and most oppressive regime in history.

I may or may not support abhor a political system that refuses to allow the opportunity to present such diverse alternatives. I may remind the League that in the Soviet Union they would not even be allowed to present their opinions.

Paste vs Tape

This concerns the defacing of buildings and public property (post boxes, lamp standards etc.) caused by using paste for posting flyers. Masking tape and staples are among the less permanent means that can be used. Organizations using paste should be made to clean up their visual pollution. If mindless methods of pasting flyers reflect attitudes within the organization responsible — boycott! It is sadly curious to note that frequently the most offensive offenders proffer militant causes.

Further, since repetition is the essence of advertising, the notice boards on the U of T campus are inadequate. A number of well-designed, generous kiosks would make sense. I miss the colorful parade of announcements that used to grace the boarding around the restoration site at UC.

Campus duplication

I wish to comment on your article "Duplication Wastes Money" which appeared in the February 3 issue.

The decision to centralize or decentralize any administrative service such as duplicating is not a simple one. Technology is changing rapidly. A program which is highly cost effective today may be obsolete within 6 months.

Your article presented effective arguments for the increased centralization of duplicating services. The U of T Press do indeed provide a good service at rates which are very competitive when compared to the prices charged by commercial suppliers of "instant printing".

However, had your reporters investigated thoroughly the present trend to Decentralized Duplicating on campus, they would have discovered that new technology, (basically the Xerox 9200-9400 Duplicators), has enabled individual departments to meet their own duplicating requirements for some 20 per cent less than what they would otherwise have to pay to the Press. This accounts for the present trend to Decentralized Duplicating on the campus.

As for bulk purchase of paper and other supplies, this is already a practice of the University Purchasing Department who acquire paper in 20 million sheet lots at the lowest possible price available in Canada.

The behaviour of the marketplace always reflects the move to efficiency and economy in administrative operations.

Gov Con Elections

It is with some interest that I note that one F. Pegolo is running for a seat on the Governing Council. This interest is due to the fact that he lists in his credentials the fact that he is currently a member of the Erindale College Council (ECC) and also of The Executive Committee of that body. Both of these statements are true. Mr. Pegolo is a member of the ECC and was elected at its March 31, 1977 meeting to sit on the Executive Committee as one of the five full-time students on that body. However, since his election to that body he has not attended a meeting of the Committee, nor can I recall his presence at the last two ECC meetings. If Mr. Pegolo is the concerned student he presents himself as then where has he been? I sincerely hope that when students vote for the Governing Council they do so keeping in mind Mr. Pegolo's attendance record in the ECC. What guarantee have we that he will do better this time?

Analysis: Vandalism

By PAUL WILSON

A recent rash of vandalism, culminating in $345 worth of damage to New College's Huron Street entrance has caused the dean of men, Larry Kurtz, to ask for students' help in curbing "punk" activities.

In addition to the vandalism, Kurtz noted in a memo to New College residents the disappearance this year of two original prints from the Senior Common Room, two graduation pictures, an amplifier and a large coffee table. The memo concludes: "Any information you can provide leading to the guilty individuals will be treated in strict confidence."

In other residences in the past few years deans have had to contend regularly with doors being broken by battering rams, linen being burnt in fire-places, and fire hoses and extinguishers being emptied in halls and common rooms.

Surprisingly enough in most cases of rowdiness the administration is willing to turn a blind eye, according to a Physical Plant spokesman. The prevailing attitude seems to be that if the offender can be caught and made to pay, then let him pay; otherwise, chalk it up as building maintenance and don't lose any sleep over it, the spokesman said.

Why is the administration so apathetic towards the destruction of their buildings? One possibility is that Simcoe Hall and Physical Plant officials most likely can't remember a time when students have posed so little a threat to the peaceful running of a university.

As recently as five years ago, 300 students stormed into Sidney Smith Hall and took over the Math Department, demanding student control over staffing policy. In the spring of 1972, Simcoe Hall was occupied by about 1,000 students, protesting the university's library policy and the use of Metro police to break up an earlier demonstration.

Between 1970 and 1972, students also:

- occupied Sidney Smith Hall to protest insufficient student representation in the Faculty of Arts and Science.
- staged an overnight sit-in at Robarts Library to publicize student complaints about restricted library access;

- picketed a Victoria College parking lot in an attempt to have it turned into a playing field. The students successfully prevented all but two of the cars from entering the lot.

- occupied Simcoe Hall, opposing the University's daycare policy. This ended with the university agreeing to fund a daycare centre
- marched on Queen's Park in a group 600 strong to protest proposed cutbacks in educational spending.

Today a group of students over 20 is considered a crowd. Recent protests against unemployment, OSAP restrictions and tuition hikes have fallen flat due to student apathy. It seems that today's undergrads are more concerned with guaranteeing themselves a job after graduation than with fighting for their rights.

To an administration which has suffered through demonstrations and sit-ins, broken windows and empty fire extinguishers must seem like pretty tame stuff.

Enrolment cut 50% at Teacher's College

By KEN WHITEHURST

The bleak outlook for teachers in Ontario became even bleaker when Education Minister Tom Wells announced last week that enrolment at the Ontario Teacher Education College (OTEC) will be cut by 50 per cent.

There will be 300 openings at the Toronto branch of the college and 150 openings at the Hamilton branch.

Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) Chairperson Miriam Edelson criticized the education minister's decision. "This is another example of ad hoc planning by the government," said Edelson.

But she said OFS has no plans to take action on behalf of students who want to be teachers.

Prospective teachers can also expect little protection from opposition party MPPs because provincial legislators are more concerned about pleasing their more numerous teacher constituents than they are the fewer would-be teachers.

The Ontario Teachers' Federation is urging provincial legislators to reduce enrolment in teachers colleges and faculties of education across the province.

Both Liberals and New Democrats have been pressuring the Government since July 1977, when Ministry of Education spending was being debated to reduce the number of new teachers.

NDP Education Critic Evelyn Gigantes blames young people's loss of opportunities in the teaching profession on the Government's slow reaction to the public schools' declining enrolment.

However, she said, "It would be misleading to students to let enrolment in the teachers colleges remain high."

NDP Colleges and Universities Critic Ted Bounsall said reduced OTEC enrolment will force students to attend teachers college at universities distant from their present places of residence.

This will increase the cost of attending teachers college, Bounsall said, and the financial burden may be too great for students who have been cut off from provincial grants by Colleges and Universities Minister Harry Parrott.

Robert Sheridan, an education officer in the education ministry's Teacher Education Branch, said the government miscalculated the natural attrition rate among teachers. He considers this to be the cause of the teacher surplus rather than of a failure to react to declining enrolment.

He pointed out that enrolment at OTEC has been reduced 25 per cent a year for the last three years.

Because of a tight economy, Sheridan said, teachers have not been leaving the profession for other jobs as they once did.

"We have instituted an early retirement scheme for teachers, but to make it any more generous would be too great a burden on the taxpayer," he stated.

Likewise, Sheridan says the ministry considers the cost to the taxpayer too high to continue training a surplus of teachers.

He suggested that students who still want to teach, in spite of the poor job market, should plan to specialize in areas like special education or multicultural education.

Enrolment at U of T's Faculty of Education could be reduced by 10 per cent this year, but Faculty of Education Associate Dean Walter London said that reduced enrolment is not a certainty.

The Faculty of Education is pursuing a policy of phased reductions over a period of years to limit enrolment, but, he said, the faculty is shying away from drastic reductions, because "there will always be people who want to take the odds and try for a teaching position."

Analysis

By KATHY CANTY

The role of students in the government of this university will be seriously diminished if the recommendations contained in Jack Macdonald's five-year External Review of Governing Council are adopted.

First of all, Macdonald wants to reduce student representation on the standing committees of Governing Council. At present there are three students and six teaching staff on the Planning and Resources Committee, while seven students and 11 faculty members sit on Academic Affairs Committee. Macdonald proposes that these two committees be combined, but he has no intention of maintaining the same membership proportions. On his 61-member Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning, Macdonald wants 26 teaching staff, and only a tiny contingent of seven students.

But the bad news doesn't end here. To make it easier for the faculty to swamp the student vote on this new giant committee (which incidentally would be the most powerful committee of Governing Council), Macdonald recommends that U of T rescind its regulation that no estate can form a majority on standing committee.

The external review also completely

The Macdonald Report: it will be our loss disregards the demands of student organizations for parity with the faculty in their representation on Governing Council. It proposes that no changes be made in the membership of this legislative body.

Macdonald justifies his decision with the assertion that there is no need to maintain a balance between the estates: "Experience on the Governing Council has illustrated regularly that the respect and acceptance accorded ideas and debate depend on the merit of ideas, not the estate from which they originate."

Presumably Macdonald feels that the committees of Governing Council also make decisions in this lofty manner. So why does he see fit to expand the representation of teaching staff on his Committee on Academic Affairs and Resource Planning?

Basically, Macdonald is biased. The mandate of the external review was to examine the effectiveness of the Governing Council system in meeting the needs of U of T. He seems to think that the best way to serve U of T is to serve the faculty. Although all sectors of the university had complaints about the Governing Council system, Macdonald immediately focussed on those of the faculty.

"The strength of faculty criticism may be the most important finding in this review," he writes. "In the last analysis the quality and commitment of the faculty must determine the reputation and the success of the University in achieving its high purposes."

Working under the premise that faculty alienation is the main problem with the Governing Council system, Macdonald naturally concludes that the best way to solve this problem is to appease the faculty.

Macdonald's method of researching his report was anything but objective. He made a point of finding out informally the views of a number of people at U of T. But he admits that these individuals were mainly faculty members who had not chosen to volunteer their opinions. He received a large number of letters and briefs from teaching staff, and his hearings with the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) were closed, unlike any other group's submission.

Hanging over the heads of many administrators at U of T these days is the threat that UTFA might unionize. U of T President John Evans came up with the proposal for an external review of Governing Council only a few weeks prior to the teaching staff referendum on a Collective Bargaining Agreement in the fall of 1976.

This may be an attempt on the part of Evans to soften the feelings of the faculty towards Simcoe Hall. And Macdonald may have felt the pressure to do the same.

Macdonald fails to realize, however, that the main reason for faculty alienation has absolutely nothing to do with the structure of Governing Council. Increases in salaries and benefits are harder to obtain in these days of retrenchment. This has made them, to a greater extent, the adversaries of Simcoe Hall.

The faculty association is delighted with the results of the Macdonald report. While the external review in some ways represents a gain for the faculty, it also represents a loss for all members of Governing Council.

Macdonald wants to take away much of the power of this legislative body and give it to the president. Under his proposals, Governing Council would no longer be able to formulate policy. It would only approve or reject new policies brought forward by the president.

So the Macdonald report may only be a Pyrrhic victory for the teaching staff. If its proposals are implemented, however, it will represent a defeat, not only for the students at this university but also for the democratic process.

China Report - third in a series...

Notes from a Nanking Diary

By David Brown

David Brown is a former U of T student now studying at Nanking University, in central China. In this third in a series of articles dispatched from Nanking, Brown describes aspects of the daily life of students and inhabitants of Nanking.

NANKING
Founded in 1902, Nanking University (NanDa) first served as a regional university for southeastern China, and then as the national university during the Republican period. In fact many European-style homes, former chancellors' or professors' quarters, still dot the campus, and many foreign language books in the main library bear the unmistakable missionary touch of pre-1949 times. Since 1949, NanDa has stood as one of the major scientific universities in the country. Eight of the twelve faculties teach natural or applied sciences, and they contain well over 70 per cent of the 3,000 member student body. Of the four remaining departments — foreign languages, history, politics and Chinese literature — the foreign language department is the largest with over 200 students. By contrast, the history department contains less than 50 students.

Like all other Chinese universities, NanDa was closed during the late 60's and early 70's. When it reopened in 1972 the student body had been cut by more than half, from 7,000 to 3,000 students. Current plans call for a moderate increase in size next year, and NanDa will undoubtedly match the Ministry of Education's announced goal of expanding national university enrolment by 50 per cent within three years' time.

During the leadership conflict of the past few years, NanDa was headed by a cadre associated with the 'moderate' faction. It was probably no coincidence that NanDa's Party Secretary, Zhou Lin, took office in 1975, the same year Deng Xiao-ping returned to power. From 1956 until 1965, Zhou Lin had been First Party Secretary in Guizhou Province. At the start of the Cultural Revolution, he was branded a counter-revolutionary revisionist, and put on trial in February, 1968. Resurfacing in 1975, he obviously proved himself well during the past two years, for in October, 1977 he was appointed First Party Secretary at Peking University (one of the intellectual strongholds of the Gang of Four), and concurrently a vice-minister in the Ministry of Education.

The Battle of Building Eight was short and pointed. The main dormitory on campus, Building Eight houses male students on the first floor, and female on the upper four — a fact not unrelated to the reasons for battle.

One morning a poster appeared at the main entrance to the dormitory. Written by some men from the ground floor, the notice accused the residents of a fourth-floor room of 'immoral conduct'. Apparently the previous day the men had taken advantage of the sunny weather to hang some clothes outside their window to dry. No sooner were the garments out, than they were soaked by a painful of dirty water thrown from above. Sicking their heads out to investigate the source of this outrage, the men were unceremoniously drenched by a second pan of water. Duly offended, the men resorted to a drastic course of action — they publicly posted a 'da-zi bao' accusing the women of this 'immoral conduct'.

In haste to vent their anger the men did not thoroughly investigate matters. The next day the accused replied with a "da-zi bao" of their own entitled, "Without investigation, you have no right to speak". At the time of the crime, the women claimed, they were out watching a movie — a case of mistaken identity! Not merely content to establish their innocence, the women made a telling point: before making a public accusation, why had the men not walked up the three flights of stairs to talk things over? The affair ended amicably, with the women extending an open invitation to their neighbours below to come up for a visit.

Would three floors of female students have deterred the men from going up to talk matters over? Sexual relations among Chinese students remain, at least to this foreign student, somewhat enigmatic. While in class it seems no barriers exist, distinct albeit oft unspoken ones characterize other aspects of life. In the cafeteria attitudes. After four months, a more relaxed atmosphere now prevails. But ours is a homogeneous community, a mixture of only two history classes. The social barriers in Building Eight due to differences in sex, department and year are not so readily surmountable.

Few Chinese university students marry students they meet during their stay. In general little socializing, as we know it, exists between the sexes — out for a movie, a Sunday in the park, or even going out shopping. Two basic reasons account for this situation. Most university students are in their early 20's, whereas the government encourages people to wait until their mid, or late 20's before they marry. Moreover, since students are assigned jobs upon graduation, there would be no guarantee that two people would receive assignments in the same region. Consequently most students wait until they are settled in their new jobs before thinking about marriage.

students segregate themselves first according to sex, and then according to department. (With origins rooted deep in their social culture, Chinese still gather tightly around small 'family' or 'village' social groupings, infrequently venturing outside. Chinese students associate primarily with classmates or fellow students in their department. Few know students in other departments, nor make any effort to cross the barrier.) When one female foreign student suggested to her Chinese friends that they eat at a table by the window, her friends dissuaded her, saying male students normally ate at those by the window. Our puzzled questions meet with equally puzzled replies — is it not natural that men would want to eat with men, and women with women?

In our dormitory the males live on the second floor, females on the third. When we first arrived, our Chinese roommate wishing to borrow a book from a female classmate above, would stand at the foot of the stairs, call the person, and the transaction would take place at the half-way point. Little wonder the men of Building Eight opted for posting a 'da-zi bao!' In all fairness, our roommates' behavior stemmed as much from an unfamiliarity with foreign students, male and female, as from sexual were finally invited to join the staff in preparing the food in the kitchen. Another time students went to the "24-hour" restaurant early one morning. Business was rather slack at 2 a.m., so the restaurant staff pulled out some bottles of beer and joined the students in meal and conversation.

Within the university a more relaxed atmosphere also prevails. Chinese students, not necessarily our roommates, are willing to go out to movies, parks or restaurants. While they admit there is the possibility of being questioned about going out with a foreigner, the fact that we are schoolmates provides an answer difficult for anyone to challenge. Over the New Year holidays students were invited for the first time to professors' homes. Apparently this reflects a change in university policy, for in the future professors may freely invite foreign students to their homes. Students in the foreign languages department recently invited us to an evening get-together designed to make a formal introduction between foreign and or shaves. (Many people are very sensitive about foreigners taking their pictures. One barber refused to let a foreign student take a picture of him at work, saying the student was not taking pictures of the true socialist China and would present an incorrect impression of general life!) Further down the street stands a mobile variety-goods cart selling anything from pencils to balloons. While providing only supplementary services, these mobile vendors, cobblers and barbers are scattered throughout the city, and people use them frequently.

Like most southern cities "fast-food" restaurants abound in Nanking. Located within a two-minute walk of the university are several small roadside shops where by 5:30 a.m. people are already eating a breakfast of noodles with flat cakes. In front of the shops vendors sell rice cakes or sticky wheat cakes with a glutinous filling. At lunch the menu may change to fried dumplings or greens may be added to the noodles. One small shop — the "24-hour restaurant" — contains a "salad bar" from which customers choose a combination of meat slices and vegetables which are then fast fried in hot pans.

Meals in these small restaurants are very inexpensive. A breakfast of half a pound of glutinous wheat cakes (heavy, but filling) costs (Can.) 10 cents. A large bowl of noodles runs to about the same. Fried dumplings are slightly more expensive, half a pound (25 dumplings) costing twenty cents. On the restaurant ladder, eating at the "24-hour restaurant" marks the last rung before reaching the larger, more expensive restaurants. A meal there of fried meat and vegetables, plus the omnipresent bowl of rice can run up to fifty cents.

"Fast-food" restaurants have the simplest of kitchens — an old oil can filled with sand (and sometimes encased in cement), lined at the top and slightly hollowed to hold coal. When the pan is placed on top, the kitchen is ready to serve. All else that is required is a cook who can deftly manipulate several pans at the same time, and an efficient preparations staff to knead the dough, mince the meat, fold the dumplings or mix the vegetables.

Chinese students. At the end of the gathering, the Chinese students went out of their way to give us their room numbers and asked us to drop by when we had the time. Also, roommates previously unwilling to venture outside with foreigners will now go out, leaving the distinct impression that a "foreigners are good" policy has recently been adopted. Yet change moves at different paces in different areas. Friends at Peking University say they have had no indication of such moves, and a professor at the Peking Language Institute, while delighted to hear of the changes in Nanking, believed it would take a much longer time to bring about a more relaxed atmosphere in Peking.

In contrast to the suburban isolation of Peking University and the Peking Language Institute, the central location of NanDa comes as a welcome change. Once out the university gate, you immediately enter into the colourful streetlife of Nanking. Usually to the left of the gate sits a middle-aged cobbler, who every day sets up shop with his stool and repair box. On sunny days an older friend of his passes the time lying in a cart reading novels. On the right are two open-air barber stalls where passers-by may get haircuts

Just south of the old An De Men city gate lies the tomb of the King of Borneo, who died in 1408 while visiting the court of Yong Le. While the original tomb no longer exists, the site's excellent feng-sui (sympathetic relationship to the natural elements) has attracted numerous other graves. While most people in China are cremated after death, the custom of burial still persists in various rural areas. Graves are marked by simple tombstones and large, rounded mounds of earth, topped with two small pots of earth.

Most people prefer cremation, and their ashes are placed either in a relative's home or a municipal mausoleum. Funeral ceremonies are simple. Relatives and friends drive in a small procession to the mausoleum, where a short eulogy is said, and the remains cremated. One often sees such processions in the streets: a few trucks carrying people wearing black arm bands, white flowers and carrying large paper wreaths. Often one person also carries a picture of the deceased, draped in black cloth.

Since productive land is scarce, graveyards tend to be in remote areas, such as the King of Borneo's tomb. Where graves once occupied usable land, they have generally been moved to other areas. At one rural commune outside Soochow, we saw a hill terraced with old Men and women at Nanking University settle disputes through 'dazi baos' rather than conversation.

We shall immediately take the proper steps to correct this problem.

"Caring for the people's livelihood includes reducing noise in the city and creating a quieter environment for the masses. In the great tradition of Party concern for the livelihood of the masses, and adhering to the line of the Eleventh Party Congress, we shall properly solve this problem."

Ma Bell could not have written a better reply. Yet the editors were not totally convinced, for an accompanying editorial stated that proof lies in deeds, not words, and asked readers to write on the progress of the restaurant. After ten years of smiles and promises, no wonder they were skeptical!

"Let one hundred flowers blossom, one hundred schools of thought contend." Once again Party officials have brought forth this slogan to signal a move toward

"Journey to the West" technically rivals even the best Disney cartoons of the time. "Slaves", a historical drama describing events during the 1950's in Tibet contains striking scenes filmed in Lhama temples. Yet the film suffers from a problem endemic to most Chinese movies. After a well directed opening describing social conditions and religious influence in Tibetan society, the arrival of the Liberation Army prompts the director to revert back to simplified, stereotyped handling of matters.

It might seem odd to have to justify humour, but recently national papers have run several articles stating that laughter is not counter-revolutionary, and in fact even aids in the promotion of socialist consciousness. Prompting this discussion was the re-release of an early 1960's film entitled, "Today is my Day Off", depicting the good deeds performed by an off-duty policeman. The hero bumbles along helping people all the while missing a rendez-vous with a young woman with whom his superior tries to match him. The director weaves the political message and the love story with at least some degree of subtlety, not often seen in Chinese movies. Drawing large audiences, the film demonstrates the popular appeal of a genre long absent from the Chinese screen.

Chinese opera suffered badly during the Cultural Revolution, particularly with the introduction of modern revolutionary Peking opera. Recently the Jiangsu Opera Troupe visited NanDa providing us with an opportunity to speak with musicians and actors. Several traditional Chinese instruments not used in Cultural Revolution operas have been reincorporated into the orchestra. Although the actors we met had been trained in all the traditional styles and arts of Chinese opera, they had not been able to use these talents during the last decade except on tours outside China. Younger actors had not even received basic training in the martial arts, tumbling and classical singing. While troupe members said that this combination of rustiness and lack of skills would hamper the pace at which new operas could be staged, there would be a gradual reintroduction of classic opera adapted for modern audiences.

One such production, "Fifteen Strings of Cash", recently opened in Nanking. Based on a popular story of the late Ming dynasty, it depicts a confrontation between good and bad officials. A lower level judge wrongly condemns a young girl for the murder of her father. The real murderer, a cowardly thief named Weasel, ingratiates himself with the judge and calls for quick execution of the sentence. In despair the girl appeals to a higher magistrate and convinces him of her innocence. Risking his position to save the girl, the magistrate dupes the real murderer into confessing. Justice prevails, and the girl is released. The magistrate and murderer were obviously played by older actors, for their performances were flawless. One readily sees the popular appeal of such operas. Strongest testament to its appeal was that the audience remained until the end, even applauding the actors, not the easiest reaction to draw from a Chinese audience.

There are definite indications of a new environment more amenable to academic work. Given the long-range emphasis on scientific and technological development, faculties of natural and applied sciences will benefit immensely. On a personal level, many leading researchers and theoreticians are receiving attention from the national press, and accounts are being given of their current research.

Much more difficult to gauge are changes in the social sciences, a politically more sensitive area. Certain improvements have occurred. China's major history journal, "Historical Research", has changed from a bi-monthly to a monthly publication. Until recently, NanDa's social science quarterly largely contained theoretical material published in the Party journal, "Red Flag". At the request of the faculty such material has been eliminated, and the journal will concentrate on publishing research papers. Several old professors of history once in disgrace at NanDa, have been restored to places of prominence. Other professors are planning to publish materials gathered during the past ten years, but which they were unable to publish.

While many professors are taking obvious delight in revealing the historical fabrications put forth during the Anti-Lin Anti-Confucius campaign, to foreign students the debates more often seem like tempests in a teapot. When the smoke lifts, two conclusions are put forth: worthwhile research cannot operate on the principle that black can be called white, and one should be accurate and faithful when quoting sources. Although one is tempted to scoff at such assertions of basic conditions of research, one cannot deny the feeling of optimism and relief which many Chinese academics hold. To professors whose libraries were sacked during the Cultural Revolution, or who were purged from faculties and often forced to flee to other universities, the current situation does indeed resemble a "second liberation". What results the new conditions will bring remain to be seen. Given the history of intellectual liberalisations in the 50's and 60's, one must harbour a certain wariness and cynicism about the concrete meaning of the new relaxation.

Reference Digest, not available to most foreigners, prints excerpts from the foreign press on world and Chinese events. Reference Digest rarely publishes full excerpts. Instead it selectively quotes short passages which describe or analyse an event in a way consistent with China's foreign policy. Currently the bulk of published excerpts deal with questions on Soviet-American relations and stress the necessity for a firmer American stance against the Soviets. Even in Reference Digest news of events is not necessarily published immediately nor directly. Nearly a week passed before news of Albania's criticism of China emerged in the internal press. Ross Munroe's articles on social control in China were not quoted directly; rather, a short commentary by Agence France-Presse was published.

Recently the national press has paid close attention to questions concerning the living and working conditions of the masses. An exchange of letters to the editors of the People's Daily, an exchange noteworthy for its freshness and directness, reflects this trend.

A Shanghai man wrote complaining of the high noise created by the exhaust fans of a nearby restaurant. The problem had plagued area residents for over ten years, but pleas to restaurant officials to install noise-abatement devices had fallen on deaf ears. Even intervention by area officials did not help, the restaurant gave polite assurances of cooperation but in the end let matters drop. Exasperated, the man was now making the problem known to readers in general.

The restaurant's reply sounds all too familiar: "After receiving Science faculties should benefit from new university expansions.

Comrade Ding's letter, we immediately looked into the matter and concluded his complaint was justified. We warmly welcome the suggestions he has made.

Over the past few years our restaurant has installed a number of air-exhaust devices. We did so to improve the quality of service to our customers and upgrade working conditions in our kitchens. Unfortunately their installation also caused some problems, particularly the resulting noise for our neighbours. In cooperation with the masses and higher administrative levels, we have frequently investigated the matter and initiated improvements. We still have yet to solve the noise problem of one large fan, but are looking into the situation. Of course the major cause of our past neglect has been the damage and confusion directed towards our restaurant by the Gang of Four (Could there be any other reason?). In October we took note of this, and invited area residents to come and discuss matters with us. We note your paper is once again encouraging readers to air grievances, and this of course prompted us to resolve this matter.

diversification and relaxation in cultural and academic fields. In the arts, the revolutionary prototypes of the Cultural Revolution are giving way to styles of earlier periods. National papers have published articles discussing the need for greater variety in subject matters and a move away from rigid, formulaic styles. Hao Ran's novels no longer enjoy the official esteem they drew during the Cultural Revolution. In fact the novel, "The History of Pioneers", which during the Cultural Revolution stood as the negative example against which Hao Ran's works were contrasted, today receives plaudits as an exemplary work.

Current trends in cinema and Chinese opera parallel those in literature: a revival of pre-Cultural Revolution works and a reaffirmation of their merits. Chinese filmmakers are having a field day, flocking to see movies released after twelve years of suppression. Several of these films have shown the promise and potential of the film industry in the early 1960's. "Monkey King Runs Wild in Heaven", a 1963 animated feature based on the classical novel gravestones. Commune members explained that during 1958 old graves were exhumed, remains cremated and then placed in a new communal burial area so that the land could be farmed. They then used the colourful tombstones to build retainer walls for the terraces, making it one of the most attractive and intriguing terraced fields in China.

Crowds were gathering along the tree-lined main street of Nanking even before dusk fell. Families had set up stools and tables on the sidewalk, drinking tea and eating their evening meal. Everyone had gathered in anticipation of the first Lantern Parade to be held since the beginning of the Cultural Revolution. The parade was to start the October 1st National Day celebrations, and would feature over a dozen dancing dragons, several Chinese drum and cymbal groups and hundreds of Chinese lanterns.

We arrived at the city square half an hour before the parade was scheduled to begin, and already the crowd was immense. Thousands of people milled about the square, and the police had given up trying to clear a path for the parade. Shortly after the parade was to have started, a public announcement asked people to disperse and return home. Crowd control had proved impossible, and municipal authorities were not willing to risk the consequences of dragons dancing to the beat of drums and cymbals snaking through the mass of people. Obviously disappointed, people nonetheless slowly made their way home.

To the credit of Nanking officials the parade was held several days later, albeit in the daytime and under strict crowd-control measures. Every unit could send a few delegates to watch the parade at assigned places, while most people were not allowed to enter the parade area. Daylight dampened the visual impact of the dragons and lanterns, and organizers had watered down the number of drum and cymbal groups. Nevertheless, the parade was held, and perhaps next year the hanging of the lanterns will truly come to pass.

For months I was puzzled by the large crowds gathered around publicly posted copies of daily newspapers. The reason becomes clear when you realize that in a country of over 940 million people, the largest national daily, People's Daily, has a circulation of only 5 million copies. Guang Ming Daily, another major national paper directed more toward an intellectual audience, has an even smaller circulation, each area of the country allotted a specific quota every year. Consequently copies are distributed to work units for common use. An office of about thirty people, or a university class might share a copy.

Three types of newspapers provide the major source of news for the Chinese. People's Daily and Guang Ming Daily contain most major theoretical articles, features and world news. While the People's Daily relegates world news to the back page, recently it has been publishing a larger percentage of immediate world news. The exchange of protests between Vietnam and Cambodia were published promptly, yet ten days passed before People's Daily tersely announced the visit of Egyptian President Sadat to Israel.

Regional newspapers duplicate many major articles, but print some news on local political and cultural events. An internal newspaper,

Top level minorities scarce: prof

By MAUREEN ROACH

Multiculturalism is being used as a political strategy to diffuse the demands for rights of minority groups at this university, said U of T Professor Frank Case.

According to Case, the scarcity of members of minority groups in administrative positions at U of T explodes the popular myth of multiculturalism.

A panel of three, considering the role of the university in a multicultural society at Innis College Town Hall last Friday, investigated U of T's hiring policy, the university's attitude towards foreign students and the attitude of Canadians towards the Third World as a whole.

"The problem probably lies at the source," Case said, and cited the limited success of minorities entering the School of Library Science, the Faculty of Nursing and the Department of Rehabilitation Medicine.

"If they cannot enter professional faculties how will they become administrators? The university should be made to adopt an 'affirmative hiring policy' — if two persons equally qualified apply for a position the member of the racial minority would be given preference, he said.

Case further saw the need at U of T for a system of arbitration where discriminatory action would be immediately investigated and remedied.

Dr. Madan Handa pointed out the need for direct action on the part of those in power. He remarked that in a city where half the children are from immigrant homes and where increasing discrimination especially against East Indians is seen, there is a need for communication between the university and the public.

Graduate student Alok Mukerjee noted that the nationalistic sentiments resulting from the decline in the Canadian economy are projected onto foreign students. They are regarded erroneously as freeloaders on Canadian taxpayers, a misconception, Mukerjee said, based on lack of information about their numbers, expenses and activities.

While some Canadians oppose the entry of foreign students, Mukerjee states, 70 percent of PhDs, 40 percent of university teachers and 50 percent of Canadian economists have been trained abroad. "Foreign students are beneficial to the university and in any case the university only admits them according to the number of vacancies it has," Mukerjee concluded.

Men's athletic union to stay in the ring

By KEN WHITEHURST

The Victoria University Student Administrative Council (VUSAC) at a recent meeting chose not to pass the concurrent resolution necessary to request Victoria's Board of Regents to withdraw recognition from the Victoria College Athletic Union (VCAU).

Former VUSAC President Bill Siksay, the mover of the motion that could have led to the disbandment of the men's athletic union, is satisfied that the athletic union is headed for the showers.

"I think the VCAU executive is making sincere efforts to make some organizational plans," said Siksay.

VUSAC President Alistair Macrae said he is optimistic that the end of the VCAU problem has been reached.

The council seemed satisfied that VCAU money has not gone toward paying for an extravagant lunch for the athletic union executive. (Charges were made at an earlier VUSAC meeting that $150 had been spent on lunch by the VCAU executive.)

VCAU President Bob Isles has been busy drafting a new constitution in response to the threat to his organization. He is planning to hold a meeting of all VCAU members this week. All men registered at Victoria College are members of the organization.

"We talked to Alistair Macrae, and I think we were able to satisfy him," said Isles.

TRANSITIONAL YEAR PROGRAMME

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

Applications for admissions to the 1978-79 academic session are now available.

The Programme is a one-year, full-time pre-admission course of studies for prospective students who were not able to complete high school to qualify for University admission due to social and/or financial reasons. Students in the programme are generally at least 19 years old and have been in the work force. Admissions will be based on motivation, needs and abilities. Qualified students are eligible for financial assistance through the Ontario Student Awards Programme.

Investment policy examined

By ALAN STEWART

The External Affairs Committee of Governing Council has struck a committee to study an administration recommendation on the university's investment policy. Recommendation Three, discussed at the committee's Feb. 8 meeting, would give the university's senior investment officer the power to order divestment of holdings in corporations whose policies are offensive to "the broader community" outside the university.

The issue was initially brought up by graduate rep Chris Rogers, who presented a five-page report urging Governing Council to form a committee which would formulate a comprehensive policy on investments "in countries with governments of a controversial nature."

The administration countered with a two-page brief prepared by Presidential Assistant Jack Sword. The brief proposed to give extensive authority to the university's senior investment officer, while emphasizing the need to avoid "taking an institutional stance of political activism or adopting public postures of moral superiority."

Rogers' recommendations failed when no one would second his motion. Even the administration's proposals were criticized as visionary and impractical.

"Should we restrict our investments to the 15 countries in the world which are simon pure?" asked Alumna rep Joyce Forster. "It becomes ludicrous," she said. "All these resolutions and 40 cents will buy you a cup of coffee."

Alex Rankin, Vice-President, Business Affairs, ridiculed both the Rogers and the administration recommendations, suggesting that there were better ways of expressing moral disapproval of corporations. "If we don't like Noranda, why accept their research money? Why visit this on the little investment committee?"

The committee voted to accept the administration's first recommendation, which emphasized academic discussion as the primary means of dealing with social and political issues. Chris Rogers and James Kraemer will be joined by two members appointed by the Business Affairs Committee to form the subcommittee which will examine Recommendation Three.

Foreign books popular

By RAY SCHREMPF

American and British writers have cornered the book market in Canada because our literature is too "literary" and doesn't cater to popular tastes, said publisher Peter Martin.

At a discussion on "Problems in Canadian Writing and Publishing," Martin said a publisher takes a big risk when publishing a Canadian first novel. He pointed out that about 40 Canadian first novels were published last year when approximately 1,000 publishable manuscripts were available. He said that Canadian culture is under a lot of pressure because of the flood of foreign books on the market.

Novelist Peter Such added that in comparison with other countries Canada should publish annually 10 times as many Native Canadian first novels as it does.

Members of the panel, which also included William French, book editor of the Globe and Mail, Randall Ware, executive director of the Canadian Booksellers Association, and former publisher Hugh Kane, investigated the causes of and remedies for this weakness in Canadian literary culture.

The panel agreed that mass market exposure of Canadian paperbacks is good for the literature, but the mass market is "too dominated by American stuff," Martin said. American books, which may not be successful even in Canada, find their way here because of a market controlled from New York, said Martin. He disagreed with levying import quotas as a remedy because they would restrict free speech.

Such said that Canadians want Canadian books and called for new methods to compete with the United States. He blamed the Liberal Government for being too continentalist in its thinking. Because it is not interested in local culture, Such said, writers should use political stratagems to alleviate the poverty of our writers.

Such suggested a Crown corporation for the distribution of books for writers who complain of being treated as entrepreneurs or neurotic children. Speaking for the Writers Union (of Canada), Such said that its members didn't want to be outright capitalists nor did they want to be Government agents drawing monthly salaries. He said the union seeks a middle-of-the-road position with a standard contract between writers and publishers.

Ware pointed out that 49 per cent of Canadians do not read books and that effort should be diverted to cracking this potential source. He suggested translating stories into television productions. He also felt that children should be introduced to literature in schools.

Martin countered that Canadian literature hardly ever finds its way into the schools. He said that our "timid educational bureaucracies" are intimidated by "Renaissance committees." As a result, he said, Canadian anthologies aren't getting to the children. They realize they are not getting relevant Native Canadian literature and are "turned off," Martin said.

Records Tumble As Blues Prove Best

By RAYMOND HIGGINS

The Lady Blues swimmers held onto their OWIAA championship last Saturday. Out of 15 races eight were won by Toronto swimmers and out of these victories came four league records.

Swimmers on the team with International experience — Anne Marie Latta, Karen LeGresley and Jane Wright did as well as they had been expected to.

On Friday night Latta set two individual records as she won the 200-yard butterfly and 100-yard freestyle. LeGresley took the 800-yard freestyle with a 10-second lead over teammate Elaine Keith and then along with Linda Lozowsky and Latta they produced a record in winning the 400-yard freestyle relay.

Latta came up with another record on Saturday when she won the 100-yard butterfly and LeGresley repeated her hat-trick of last year by winning the 400 and 200 freestyle and three gold medals.

One other gold medal was won for Toronto by first year star student Nancy Lee, who won the 100-yard breaststroke. Lee also notched up three place finishes in both the 200 and 400 individual medley.

Other creditable performances were turned in by Freshman Lianne Hubbard, coming second in the 400 Individual medley and Keith who came second to LeGresley in the 400 and 800 freestyle.

Captain Anne O'Brien who has battled all season with an injured shoulder, placed fifth in the 200 backstroke and fourth in the 100 backstroke, where Laura Anglin came close behind in sixth place.

In her first year of OWIAA competition, diver Jennifer Muchan did very well, coming eighth in the 1-metre and 12th in the 3-metre event.

It is not surprising looking at these results, that many of the team members qualified for the Canadian Women's Intercollegiate championships that will be held on March 2, 3 and 4 at the Etobicoke Olympium.

Veteran Jane Wright, in her last year at Toronto, placed third in the 100-yard backstroke and recorded an important silver medal finish in the 200 breaststroke. Coach Robin Campbell sees this event as being the turning point in the meet in Toronto's favour.

Western had qualified two swimmers in the consolation to Blues one for the 200 breaststroke final placing the onus on the swimmers in the consolation to widen the 17 point lead Toronto held going into Saturday night's events. Both Western and Toronto should have gained seven points each in the consolation race and in view of Western's strong diverse this would have been enough to secure them the victory.

Marilyn Preston won the race, however, as she trimmed five seconds off her earlier time and Kathy McManus placed second. This turned the expected 7-7 result into 12-2 for the Blues. When Wright edged Western out of second place in the breaststroke championship, Toronto had the title sewn up. The 388-369 victory of the Blues reflects a solid team effort as coach Robin Campbell said, "Everyone worked hard to the best of her ability and that's why we won."

Get Set!

In Indoor Track at Maple Leaf Gardens last Friday, Toronto competed in the colleges and universities section held in the afternoon. Jill Ross set a new record in the 600-yard run by winning in a time of 1:23.6. She also finished third in the 50-yard hurdles behind Jean Sparling who ran the same event in the evening. Against a strong field, Sparling managed to place sixth.

Anne Perkin normally a sprinter, came second to Ross in the 600-yard run.

Coming up in indoor track will be the OUAA and OWIAA championships at the CNE South Industries Building on February 25. The meet runs all day and gets under way at 10:00 a.m. Once more, free entertainment!

A Meet Of Surprises

By ANNETTE LEFEVRE

An upset was scored on Saturday February 11, as Western interrupted York University's seven year monopoly of OWIAA gymnastics. Western came only .35 points ahead of York, who eased out a strong McMaster team by a mere 1.75 points. Western's victory was not to the credit of any outstanding individual performances but by virtue of sheer numbers and consistent placing in the top six.

Toronto with a much smaller team, did extremely well by placing fourth less than three points behind a large Mac contingent.

An exciting contest had been anticipated in the senior division between former Olympian Nancy McDonnell of York, last year's silver medalist from McMaster, Diane Chown and Toronto's Janice Davy. Davy competed first on the floor where she injured her knee but after taping she moved on to the vault. On her second attempt at this event she dislocated her knee on landing and ended her hopes for a repeat gold medal. Although obviously in pain, Davy managed to smile and wave to the crowd as she left the gym on a stretcher.

Nancy McDonnell continued on to completely sweep the senior division, taking firsts in every event. Diane Chown of McMaster came third while a surprise team from Waterloo, competing for the first time but with club gymnasts, won the senior team title.

In the highly competitive Intermediate division, Terry Aston came up with a sixth place on the parallel bars and Patti Kagawa took fourth place on the balance beam. Ruth Aggiss tied for second place on the floor with two Mac gymnasts and teammate Sue Zielski took sixth spot.

Janice Carsell earned the all-round gold medal in the Junior division by tying for second place on the beam and securing second place on the vault.

Toronto took fourth spot in both the Junior and Intermediate divisions, doing considerably well in relation to the size of the squad. Liz Swinton has done an excellent job of coaching and perhaps under her tutelage more individuals will compete for the Blues and give the team the depth it seems to lack at the moment.

Sudden-Death Debate

By GLYNIS PETERS

This weekend in Kingston the Lady Blues Ice Hockey team put forth a valiant effort in the OWIAA finals. But the only team to beat the eventual champs, McMaster, lost in a controversial overtime semi-final to Queen's.

The Blues were told by the referee that the overtime would be sudden-death when in fact the rules call for a 5 minute overtime. This is an unfortunate way to end any season but Coach Dave McMaster was proud of the way the team handled the situation, "with great stature and character."

Queen's led 2-0 until late in the second period when Leslie Thompson scored on an assist by Linda Harley. The Gaels started out the third by jumping into a 3-1 lead but Martha Brannigan closed the gap and Linda Harley tied things up on a penalty shot.

It was a very closely-fought battle but Toronto seemed to take charge in the third period as they outshot the Gaels 12-5. During the overtime period the game remained a see-saw battle until Queen's scored at 4:34 and under the erroneous sudden-death rule the game ended.

Toronto was eliminated from the playoffs by a final score of 4-3. Queen's advanced to take on Mac and were handily beaten 6-3 in a game that could easily have seen a much higher score for Mac. Toronto had a good season and hopefully will be in the semi-finals again next year but with better results.

York Yeomen Spoil Blues Perfect Season

By HOWARD DEANE
and BRUCE HAIN

The Hockey Blues bid for an undefeated season, was destroyed as the tough checking York Yeomen won a 5-3 decision at Varsity Arena, a week ago last Wednesday.

In four other games over reading week the Blues looked anything but impressive. In league games they beat Queen's 5-4, Ottawa 5-0 at Varsity and edged the Yeomen 3-2 at the York Ice Palace. The Blues finished their season with an 18-1-1 record.

Last Friday, the Concordia Stingers dumped the Blues 4-2 in their annual exhibition game. Concordia is currently under suspension by the CIAU for using an ineligible player.

Coach Tom Watt had no excuses for the loss. "We just didn't play well. They out-hustled, out-skated, and out-everythinged us. If we play the way we did tonight there is no possible way we will win a championship — like none!"

Toronto took an early 2-0 lead, in a scramble first period, on goals by Dan Tsubouchi and Doug Caines, but that was the only scoring the Blues could produce.

Concordia came back to score four more times, while all Toronto could do was hit the post. This was also the first time Toronto had been outshot (37-26) since December.

After the loss to York, Watt was obviously disappointed. "There goes an undefeated season. We worked hard for an undefeated season. But it's better to lose now, than three weeks from now in the playoffs."

York's Glenn Wagner scored after only 39 seconds on a breakaway. This goal set the pace, and the Yeomen led for the rest of the game.

York scored twice more in the first period while Doug Caines potted the Blues only goal of the period.

York's Dave Chalk scored the only goal of the second period with only two seconds left, and, "that was the goal that hurt us," added Watt.

Dan D'Alvise and Alex Jeans netted third period goals, but this was all for naught. York scored on the empty net with only seconds left to seal the upset of the season.

In the wake of the loss to York, after the games against Queen's and Ottawa, Caines commented, "Tommy (Watt) emphasized defensive hockey." However the outspoken Gemmell put it more bluntly, "It was an ultimatum — play defensive!"

This seemed to be working against Queen's as the Blues were up 5-0 after two periods on goals by D'Alvise, Cary Farelli, Joe Grant and Caines who netted two.

However, the second period was all Queen's as they cahlked up four goals in the first eleven minutes. The Blues were lucky to hold on to their 5-4 lead. "We played a perfect first two periods, and then . . ." said Watt.

Blues' backup goalie John Mahoney, called up after Logan's injury, started his first OUAA game against Ottawa and recorded his first shutout. "It was a team shutout," he said. "Towards the end of the game I was trying not to think about it. I tried not to look at the clock."

Toronto went up 2-0 in the first period on goals by Ron Harris and Bob Sidey.

The second period was scoreless as Toronto continued to stick to defensive hockey and hold the lead. D'Alvise, Larry Hopkins and Caines rounded out the scoring in the third period.

Wednesday night saw the Blues avenge their previous week's loss to the York Yeomen by defeating the Yeomen 3-2 in an exciting match at the Ice Palace. The first period featured some wide open skating and playmaking by both sides. There is no love lost between these cross-town rivals, but one could sense that neither side wished to take any unnecessary penalties.

Aiden Flatley put the Yeomen on the scoreboard at 6:25 of the first period. Rob Gemmell tied it up for the Blues a few minutes later on a low shot from the point while the Blues enjoyed a man advantage. Some sloppy clearing in the Blues zone allowed Flatley to set up John Winder for York's second goal to round off the first period.

The Blues' power play evened the score in the second with Joe Grant and Cary Farelli combining to allow Larry Hopkins to shovel one past York goalie Steve Bosco. The latter half of the second period saw the Blues carry the play to the Yeomen only to be thwarted by some unlucky bounces and solid goaltending by Bosco. With less than one minute left in the frame, an errant pass from a York defender sent Farelli in alone on Bosco. Farelli made no mistake as he literally blasted one past his former Marlie teammate to put the Blues up 3-2.

U of T Competes At Gardens

By HUGH STUART

The university indoor track and field season got into full swing with the Maple Leaf Gardens Indoor Track and Field Games last February 10. The university invitational meet was held in the afternoon while the international athletes took over in the evening.

Led by Andy Reed, Jill Ross, and the high jumpers, U of T athletes fared well in the college meet. Ross set a meet record in the 600 yard run and took third place in the fifty yard hurdles.

In an exciting race, Reed came from behind to win the mile. The success of U of T's high jumpers was no surprise as the Blues' Roland Demarchi was the winner followed by teammates Carl Georgevski, Steve Dovaston and Rob Pitter.

U of T long jumper Steve Cheung turned in a surprise performance to finish second in the fifty yard dash. Marc Rispler also recorded a second place finish in the gruelling two mile race.

The women's team also added two second place finishes. National team member Jean Sparling placed second in the fifty yard hurdles and Anne Perkin was runner up in the 300 yard race. To cap a fine day, the women's relay team set a meet record in winning the four lap relay.

In the evening, a handful of U of T athletes competed while representing their respective clubs. National team members Jean Sparling and Paul Craig did not meet with great success but this is understandable as Sparling competed in the fifty yard hurdles against such athletes as East Germany's Johanna Klier and Israel's Esther Rot and Craig was faced with Eire's Eamonn Coghlan and Kenya's Wilson Waigwa in the mile run. In the Ontario Challenge two-mile relay, Terry Goodenough was a member of the Toronto Olympic Club foursome that finished first while, Craig Stevenson was on the second place team.

U of T athletes also performed well at the CNE Pig Palace on Saturday. Dovaston won the high jump competition and Craig took the fifteen hundred meters at the Ontario Senior Championships.

Fencers Place Second In Finals

By JIM SCARROW

Saturday February 11, saw the men's fencing team place second overall in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) Finals.

The Sabre team of Jim Cheng, Imre Boma Fischer, and Brad Patterson, placed first in its class against twelve other teams, handily defeating Western 7-2, and Queen's 8-1. Individually, Fischer placed 2nd and Cheng 6th.

The foil team of Rick Arthur, Kevin Kurnik, and Alan Steljes, placed third in their class against strong competition from Waterloo and Western.

The Epee team of David Hamer, Bruno Scherzinger and Wolfgang Wehrfritz placed a very close second, missing 1st place in an extremely tight final bout with Western.

The Western match was doubly important since it also determined Toronto's over-all standing. Each team match consists of nine bouts between individual players. U of T was behind three wins to four against Western with two bouts to go. Coming from behind, Toronto moved the score up to four bouts even. The ninth, and final bout was tense, as members from the other teams crowded around the strip. The bout started with two hits against U of T. Then Toronto broke ice with a hit.

After losing a hit to make it four to one against, Toronto recovered strongly with three hits in a row.

With two minutes of play left, a score of 14-belle meant the next hit would determine the tournament's outcome.

Missing that final hit was a tough break for the Epee team. Never before was there such a close match at the finals.

Blues Playoff Hopes Dim After Loss

By JIM O'LEARY

The Basketball Blues' hopes for their first playoff spot in three years have all but vanished after they lost 76-65 to the Carleton University Ravens at the Benson Building on Saturday.

As has been the case many times throughout this season, the difference in the game was at the foul lines. The Ravens scored 20 points on free throws while the Blues picked up only three.

Foul trouble also cost the Blues in manpower. Their leading scorer, Doug Fox and Tony Braunstein, both fouled out of the game. Randy Cook and Tim McGhie both picked up four fouls.

Led by Fox, the Blues took a 51-45 lead early in the second half. In the first half Fox scored 18 points, but was held to only two more in the second half.

The lead was short-lived however, as Jon Love of the Ravens connected on seven consecutive points to push Carleton to a 61-55 lead.

After the Ravens cut off Fox the Blues were only able to hit on 27 percent of their shots in the second half. With the Ravens playing well, the deficit was too large to be overcome by erratic shooting.

Randy Cook and Tim McGhie each picked up 12 points for the Blues.

The loss means that the Blues have to beat the number three-ranked Laurentian Voyageurs next weekend if they hope to make the playoffs. Laurentian is presently tied with York for the top spot in the division with 10-1 record.

Toronto's loss dropped their record to 5-6 — the first time it's been below .500 this season. To make the playoffs they will have to overcome Ottawa who are presently 5-5. Ottawa has two games remaining — against York and Ryerson. While they will almost certainly lose to York, Ottawa should have no trouble beating Ryerson who are still looking for their first win of the season.

Gymnasts Finish Second

The U of T gymnastic team put on a strong showing at the Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) gymnastic finals to finish second to York at York's Tait McKenzie Building on February 11. The heavily favoured Yeomen finished with 234 points while the Blues racked up 212.95 points. Queen's placed third with 180 points.

Individually, the Blues did very well. Simon Smith won vaulting and placed third on the side horse and rings to finish with 47.70 points and third place all-round.

Guy Bourbeau finished sixth while Derek Wulff was only 0.2 points back to take seventh spot. Chester Makischuk took eighth place while Willie Evans turned in a strong performance, scoring well on the vault and floor exercises.

Ryerson student Bob Ewing prepares for March demo.

SAC may call mass meet

By TOM KUHN

An unusual and perhaps unprecedented general student meeting which would have ultimate legislative power has been proposed by the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) Executive to decide U of T's role in the planned demonstration on cutbacks March 16.

The SAC General Council will decide tonight whether to call the "special meeting" of all undergraduates on Monday afternoon March 6.

Students at Ryerson, York, and Glendon College have all held large mass meetings. More have been planned for the near future on these campuses which are particularly hard-hit by the proposed provincial cutbacks.

A Metro Coalition has been set up between the various campuses, which includes students, faculty, and graduate assistant associations. SAC has attended these meetings which have worked to set up the planned demonstration at Queen's Park.

The Ontario Federation of Students' (OFS) executive will recommend at a plenary session of Ontario university representatives this weekend that the demonstration be expanded province-wide.

"This special meeting (the general student meeting at U of T) is not an input session, after which the SAC executive will decide for itself. The students will by their votes and proxies decide our participation in the demonstration," explained SAC president John Tuzyk.

Special meetings were included in the old SAC constitution and retained when SAC was re-organized and incorporated last year," said Tuzyk. They are called when the entire student body is asked to decide an issue.

"We think the issue is of such importance that students should decide what our course of action is," said Tuzyk.

The SAC executive has asked that the General Council recommend to the student body at the special meeting that they favor the Queen's Park demonstration against university cutbacks.

"I think it's great if they can get everything together. I wish them (U of T SAC) well," said Paul Hayden, York president of the Council of Students Federation. York had 700 students and faculty attend an open meeting two weeks ago at which York president H. Ian MacDonald attended and spoke.

"We have a real problem at this end. It will be hitting U of T soon," said Ryerson student president Kevin Schwenker.

"I'm not sure we're going to win anything. Either we go March 16 and show that we are articulate, that we have reasonable requests, or we can sit in classrooms with 40 people that were filled with 30 people, sit and watch them shut down our pub, shut down our media centre, shut down everything at 11:00 p.m.," exclaimed Schwenker.

Ryerson is facing cutbacks of 150 part-time sessional instructors, 10 per cent reduction in library funding, 5 per cent reduction of all academic funding, as well as a complete curfew of 11:00 p.m.

"Take U of T. Take 15 per cent off and that's what they'll have after four years, if they don't show up March 16," warned Schwenker.

The SAC executive agreed basically with the platform of the Metro Coalition, said Schwenker. The three major areas of concern about government policy in regard to post-secondary education are quality of education and accessibility to education and employment, he stated.

Parrott says students are getting too much themselves better than any student I had 10 years ago," he said.

Edelson challenged Parrott: "How can you say that the quality of education will be maintained when you know that the money allotted to the educational system is not up to the standard of maintenance?"

Parrott countered that the amount of money funnelled into the system does not reflect the quality of education. "Seven hundred and fifty million a year is going into the universities of Ontario," he said. He said he was satisfied that the public is getting their money's worth.

Moreover, he said, "85 percent of the student's education is paid by the taxpayer. In addition there are the grants and loans to assist the student." He added that he was "more concerned, not with the opportunities for education, but with the chances for gainful employment thereafter."

Cassano claimed that students will have to "scale down their expectations." He said the results of a study conducted in 1974 showed that by September of that year only 5.5 percent of students graduating were unemployed, whereas 28 percent were not even looking for jobs. "Employment may be harder to find today," Cassano said, "but the graduate is more employable."

U of T funding outlook "grim"

By KEN WHITEHURST

Provincial operating grants to the U of T will rise by 5.7 per cent for the 1978-1979 school year, which represents an increase less than the rate of inflation.

"Things look grim for next year and the near future," said U of T Vice-President, Research and Planning Harry Eastman in response to a Ministry of Colleges and Universities announcement yesterday about university financing.

The 1977-1978 grant was $152,321-million and the 1978-1979 grant will be $161,021-million. Government spending on all Ontario universities will rise by 5.8 per cent.

Eastman criticized the Government's failure to use a method of financing compatible with the needs of Ontario universities.

"Our employees are being squeezed rapidly by the government cutbacks," he said. Eastman explained that 80 per cent of the university's budget is salaries.

The Vice-President claims that the university needs $9-million increase in Government grants to meet faculty and support staff demands for salary increases.

The Government is increasing its grant to the university by $8-million, and $2-million of that grant, Eastman said, must go toward paying off this year's deficit.

The inflation-riddled university grant could force a 5 per cent decline in the standard of living of U of T faculty and support staffs.

Furthermore there will be staff cuts during the coming year. Eastman said these cuts would come from attrition. Instructors with short term contracts may not be rehired, and support staff leaving the workforce will not be replaced.

There will be larger classes and fewer course offerings next year, Eastman warned. Professors can expect money for research to be less available next year.

Real Government expenditures on universities will continue to trail off as part of Ontario Treasurer Darcy MacKeough's drive to balance the budget. This was an intention reaffirmed in yesterday's throne speech.

"The Government announcement of university grants reads like an obituary for universities," said Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) Chairperson Miriam Edelson.

She pointed to a recommendation by the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA) that said Ontario's universities would need $26-million more than the Government provided.

Edelson wondered why the Government set up OCUA as its advisor for university affairs if the council is going to be ignored.

"OFS has made specific recommendations to the Government about where money could come from to pay for increased university spending," she said. "They don't have to cut back other spending to do it, and you don't have to cry, 'Tax the corporations' either."

She said the Government foregoes revenue every year by deferring taxes. For example, she thinks the government could collect the $300-million in deferred sales taxes on machinery. She said the tax deferral was intended to stimulate Ontario's industrial growth, and it is obvious that this approach is not working.

The 1977-1978 expenditure on universities was $704,399-million and the 1978-1979 expenditure will be $745-400-million.

Women still not in top ranks

By PAUL F. ROONEY

The only way for women to become equal is to become political, said Pat Adams, president of the Association of Women Executives.

Speaking yesterday at a forum on "Women, University and Unemployment," Adams said that equal employment in universities is non-existent because they are run for and by men.

"There is no relation between intellect and the size and shape of a person's genitals," said Adams. "It's time for women to act to produce a really just society because men won't."

Adams warned that financial cutbacks in the universities will primarily affect women faculty members because they are the ones in non-tenured teaching positions.

Shelley Acheson, director of the Ontario Federation of Labor Human Rights division, castigated the government for attacking the victims of unemployment rather than the problem itself. She cited Unemployment Insurance Commission cutbacks that force "freeloaders back to work," a $1-million "propaganda campaign to brand victims of unemployment as 'UIC cheaters,'" and Government papers labelling females in the workforce as "marginal workers with unstable employment patterns."

Acheson alleged that the Government is applying pressure to force women out of the workforce and thereby resurrect the old myth that a woman's place is in the home. But she said that "together all of us can fight and bring about changes. Everyone should become politically active."

According to Dian Cohen, a Toronto Star columnist, the number of women in Canada's work force has increased by 70 percent over the last 10 years to the point where women now make up 35 percent of the total. However she added that women make up much more than 35 percent of the total number of unemployed. She gave no source for these figures.

Cohen said that the majority of working women are in stereotyped women's jobs — clerical positions or service positions such as waitresses and hairdressers. About 10 percent are professionals, mainly teachers and nurses.

Cohen said she thought the service sector of the economy, including plumbing and electrical work, would be the major area of growth for the next decade and suggested that women look to that area for jobs.

Cohen cautioned that inroads by women into male-dominated areas have been few and that discrimination still exists. Nevertheless she felt that women have a secure base in the work force in that "1 million men aren't going to go out and learn typing."

Sociology professor Dorothy Smith offered an analytical view: "In economically tight times there is competition for jobs with the result that men displace women from the work force." She said that women are forced to return to their former status of dependence on and inequality with men.

Varg Editor '78

The Varsity Committee invites applications for the position of The Varsity Editor-in-chief for the 1978-79 publishing year.

As well as resumes of work experience and educational background applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the format, editorial policy, internal structure or aspects of production. The editor will have to work with a large staff — currently numbering approximately 100 members — in devising and implementing these changes. Candidates may suggest names for the other editorial positions. The amount available for production staff this year is $16,730 including a weekly stipend of $155 for the editor-in-chief. The editor generally works a fifty to eighty hour week. Applicants will be interviewed by both the Varsity staff and the Varsity Committee. The staff shall select its choice in an election — the successful candidate must obtain 50 per cent plus one of the votes cast — and the Committee will then consider ratification of the staff choice. The editor may be removed from his position only by concurrent decision of the Varsity staff and the Varsity Committee.

Meals on wheels for the Chinese elderly

By ROBERT FIFE

Mobile meals for the elderly and disabled of the Chinese community in Toronto — that's the idea behind the "Chinese-Meals-on-Wheels" service being provided for over a year now out of St. Patrick's Church on McCaul Street.

Besides providing hot meals on a weekly basis to the elderly and Chinese patients in Mount Sinai hospital, the Meals-on-Wheels program offers home visiting and referrals, and encourages senior citizen participation in social activities according to Lydia Kwok, program co-ordinator.

The program was initiated in September 1976 by representatives of various social service agencies, the public health department, senior citizens and interested individuals. By mid-January 1977, the Meals-on-Wheels service operated largely through the efforts of volunteer workers and a successful fund-raising drive. Financial assistance from the Ministry of Community and Social Services last August enabled them to hire a co-ordinator.

Mount Sinai is the first hospital in Toronto to allow Chinese meals brought in from the community, with the hospital paying the bill. Patients receive lunch and dinner courses at the cost of $1.25 for each meal. They choose from a special diet that includes barbecued meat, egg with green beans, eggplant and beef, corn with meat and stuffed vegetables. Fruit is also provided.

Patrina Wong, member of the publicity sub-committee of the program, said, "Chinese food has a very special meaning to Chinese people; they consider the regular hospital food foreign to them." She said there have been "incidents where Chinese patients refused to eat Western food and consequently died." Wong would like to see the service extended to the nursing homes and chronic care hospitals. Both Riverdale and Doctor's Hospital are considering introduction of the service, she said, but Toronto General has not shown any interest.

Social worker Maria Lee, co-ordinator of the program for Mount Sinai Hospital, said the service goes a long way in humanizing hospital services. She said the program was responsible for the hospital hiring an interpreter who takes calls, makes doctors appointments and visits Chinese patients. Lee also acts as a liaison person between the hospital and the Chinese community.

Meals-on-Wheels services approximately 10 Chinese patients in the hospital and 10 within the Chinese community. When asked why the number of recipients is so low, Wong replied that it had to do with the attitudes of the Chinese towards assistance.

She said that most of the 40,000 to 50,000 Chinese people in Metro are from Hong Kong where social services are not as developed as in Canada. A tradition has developed among Chinese people that problems are kept "within the house," said Wong. "So accepting help from outside," she argues, "is kind of degrading and admits to the world that they (the Chinese) are unable to provide for themselves."

Wong also explained that some elderly Chinese prefer to send their savings to relatives in China. "They are not concerned about themselves," she said. She added that many people refuse to make use of the service because of the price tag attached. "If it was free," she said, "more people would take advantage of it."

Program co-ordinator Kwok said the Ministry of Community and Social Services would like to see the program expand its supportive services such as translating and grocery pick-up. Kwok agreed but said that the Ministry will not provide the additional funding.

Kwok said the Meals-on-Wheels program needs volunteers between 11:00 a.m.-1:30 p.m. each weekday. Volunteers work at least one day a week, but Kwok said she would prefer to have volunteers work on a bi-weekly basis. She said the response from Chinese students at U of T was "very poor," although she admitted that many students have "time restrictions."

Chinese food — a welcome alternative to hospital food.

Youth meet in Cuba

By SHANE PARKHILL

Two hundred and forty Canadians will be attending the 11th World Festival of Youth and Students in Havana, Cuba this summer, according to Anna Larsen, co-chairman of the Preparatory Committee of Canada. A total of 16,000 delegates representing more than 140 countries will be participating in the event from July 28 to Aug. 5.

The first festival took place in Prague in 1947, with the purpose of bringing together "anti-imperialist" young people "with the horrors of fascism and war fresh in their minds," said Larsen. Subsequent festivals have taken place in Budapest, East Berlin, Bucharest, Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna, Helsinki, Sofia, and again in East Berlin. The 11th festival will be the first one held outside of Europe.

Although eight of the 10 festivals so far have been held in Socialist countries, Larsen stressed that they are not just intended for Communists and Socialists. She pointed out that the International Preparatory Committee which is sponsoring the 11th festival is made up of representatives of the International Youth and Student Movement for the United Nations, the World Student Christian Federation, the World Federation of Democratic Youth, and other organizations. The breadth of the national preparatory committees varies considerably, she said. The British Festival Committee has the Young Conservatives among its member organizations. She also said that "most capitalist countries are not willing to put the money and effort into sponsoring such a mammoth operation. To house, feed and provide for 20,000 people is no easy task."

Larsen said that the Canadian Preparatory Committee has contacted more than 300 organizations and so far 46 have agreed to support it. Among these are the British Columbia Student Federation, the Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec, and the student councils of the Universities of Regina and Moncton. The U of T Students Administrative Council agreed last Wednesday to participate in the committee's activities.

Festival delegates will be able to participate in a wide range of events, said Larsen, including seminars, forums, exhibitions of art, photos, rallies, dances, singing, film showings, sports events, as well as parties and other informal activities.

Hydro power vs community power

By ALAN STEWART

The 10-year battle over Toronto Hydro's plan to build a switching and transforming station at Orde and McCaul Streets has not, by any measure, died down. Recently, community activists have accused Hydro of using the media to conduct a "sensationalized scare campaign" to force hasty approval of the project.

Hydro says it needs the $16-million facility to guarantee the "reliability of the delivery system" in the downtown area. Hydro officials have warned that delays in building the station increase the possibility of a major power blackout of the kind that has plagued U.S. cities in the past.

Opponents of the station argue that the station is unnecessary, potentially unsafe and potentially disruptive of the local community. Jim Bearden, a long-time campaigner against the project, says it is "almost criminal." He says studies by U of T's Institute of Environmental Studies and by G. D. Halhaway for Peter Middleton and Associates show that Hydro has never proven the need for the "double contingency reliability" provided by the project. The station, says Bearden, would be a "Cadillac facility" of little benefit to residential users of power.

U of T Professor Stuart Robertson is named by Bearden as one of the contributors to the study. Robertson told The Varsity that the study was really just a "discussion over coffee." "To say that we did a study is really not correct," said Robertson. "We looked at some plans, but that was all it was."

According to Robertson, a group of engineers offered to examine possible alternatives to the project — if the money could be found to pay for the study. "There's always an alternative," said Robertson. "In this case the alternative is energy brownouts or blackouts."

The community activists, drawn primarily from the South East Spadina Steering Committee and the Grange Park Community Group, say that the proposed station endangers the safety and health of local residents. Citing the recent explosion at a Hydro station on Adelaide Street, they warn that the sulphur hexafluoride gas used in the switching station can break down under heat and pressure, forming a gas that is odorless, colorless and lethal. In addition, according to Bearden, there should be more research into the damage incurred to people living near high-voltage power facilities. Bearden cites the large number of recent cases in which people have suffered ill health from working under high-voltage lines.

Opponents of the project have been attempting in recent years to persuade Hydro to build the station, if it is necessary, at a location on Murray Street away from the homes of local residents and the Orde Street public school. Hydro claims that the project would cost an extra $3-million if built on that site. City Council recently refused to give approval for either site, recommending that Hydro concentrate instead on reducing load growth in the downtown area.

Bob Hicks, Chief Engineer for Toronto Hydro, denies all the accusations of the project's opponents. While admitting there is no critical danger of a blackout this summer, he denied that Hydro has attempted to scare City Council into a favorable verdict. "Ten years isn't hasty," he said. Hicks says the fear of toxic gases is illusory, that all power lines will be shielded and will have no effect on residents, and that the Ministry of the Environment has declared that the explosion on Adelaide Street did not harm nearby workers.

According to Bearden, City Council's refusal to approve the project was a positive sign, but the

In a story entitled "York protests death of quality education" of Feb. 20, Isa Bakker was incorrectly identified as president of the Ontario Federation of Students. She is a member of the OFS Board of Directors. Lee Lorch, identified as president of the York University Faculty Association, is simply a member of it. The lecture hall mentioned in the first paragraph has approximately 600 seats, not 300 as stated in the article.

"... reading skills are probably better today than they ever were and where they have to do mathematics or arithmetic. I won't comment on writing because I never could write and still can't."

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

Any person or organization wishing to receive and consider complaints about the paper should sign complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

Participation

Today SAC will decide if there's going to be a general meeting of U of T students on the question of U of T's participation in upcoming anti-cutbacks rally at Queen's Park.

The idea of a general meeting is an excellent one — if SAC goes through with it. A general meeting is the best build-up possible for the rally. Instead of being dragged to Queen's Park students will be able to commit themselves to the rally. If students opt for the rally it will be for reasons they themselves thought up and argued among themselves. No amount of propaganda could beat that for the simple reason that nothing could be more convincing than one's own arguments.

There are a lot of reasons for marching on Queen's Park.

On Monday Harry Parrott announced the 1978-79 operating grants for provincially assisted post-secondary institutions in Ontario: 15 universities, Ryerson, OISE, the Ontario College of Art and a number of other places. According to Parrott funding will rise 5.8 percent over last year to $745.4 million.

The increase will not even cover salary increases at U of T. Informed of this by a Varsity reporter Parrott could only say "You can't have it every which way."

Student employment doesn't look any better. "The worst unemployment in Ontario — as in Canada — is among the youth," said the throne speech on Tuesday.

What are they going to do about it? Well, the government's "direct attack on the problem" consists of paying employers a $1 an hour wage subsidy for every student they hire. Through this program employers can expect to save $26 million in wages. High student unemployment has advantages if you're an employer.

Even in the case of manpower training for manufacturing jobs the best prospects are for the employers. Instead of increasing funding to community colleges the government wants to introduce an "employer-centred" training scheme, that "will provide the required level of skills in the shortest possible time."

Even Stuart Smith was appalled. The government, he said, has no sense of "where our universities are going." But that's not true. The government knows very well what it is doing with universities. It is trying as hard as it can to decrease the number of students going to university. We can't rely too much on Smith anyway. He himself lamented that "most of the ideas" in the throne speech "were taken from our platform."

That doesn't come as a surprise. These people all serve the same interests, the interests of the capitalist class. Students cannot count on people like Smith to intercede for them. They have to rely on their own power.

Anarchist conference

The Toronto Anarchist League, a University of Toronto club, is holding a conference entitled The International Anarchist Movement. The purpose of the conference is to provide up to the minute information on the world-wide anarchist movement and to serve as a forum for libertarian ideas.

The conference will focus on the four major arenas of anarchist activity: Greece, Spain, Germany and Italy as well as a report on anarchist activity in Canada. The informational section of the conference will be followed by an open discussion period at which time questions and suggestions for an anarchist strategy in Canada will be entertained.

Alan Bass, a student at the University of Toronto, will give a summary of the events leading up to the arrests and attempted framings of thirty Greek anarchists. Details of the trials and acquittals of the thirty anarchists and the future prospects for anarchism in Greece will be discussed by Bass.

Gary Jewell, of the Industrial Workers of the World, an anarcho-syndicalist organization, will give a report on the phenomenal growth of the anarchist CNT labour union in post-Franco Spain. The amazing rebirth of the CNT after almost forty years of clandestine existence under Franco's fascist regime is a profound testament to the resilience and continuing relevance of anarchism in Spain.

Bill Graham, a professor at the University of Toronto will give a report on the situation in Germany in the wake of the recent events surrounding the Baader-Meinhof group. The German State is using the activities of the Marxist Baader-Meinhof group as a justification for the wholesale repression of basic civil liberties. What this means for anarchists in Germany and Canada will be fully discussed by Graham.

Graeme Nicholson, also a U of T professor, will attempt to unravel the complex situation in Italy. The Italian anarchists are steadily gaining strength at the grass roots level as the Marxist left and the reactionary right battle for possession of the Byzantine Italian bureaucracy. The significance of this struggle and the role the anarchists hope to play in it will be fully explored by Nicholson.

Finally Stephen Ellams, a U of T student, will give a summary of anarchist activity in Canada and the conference will then be thrown open to the floor. The conference is scheduled to take place Thursday, February 23 at 7:30 p.m. in the Rhodes Room at Trinity College. All persons interested in libertarian socialism are invited to attend.

Post editor Maria Horvath get an open hearing and discussion at the GSU General Council Meeting set for Wednesday, February 22, at 7:30 p.m.

We would like to request that the GSU Executive put this item on the agenda for this Wednesday's meeting.

We have taken the liberty of inviting the President of the Ontario Region of Canadian University Press (ORCUP). Of course, Ms Horvath will be at the meeting covering it for the Grad Post. We hope both will be allowed to answer questions of members, so that graduate students can make a knowledgeable decision on this problem.

Staff meeting

There will be a staff meeting on Friday at 2:00 p.m. Topics on the agenda: Business manager, typesetting, Youthstream, RCMP and military ads, letters policy, elections policy and other business.

Notice of motions for Friday's staff meeting: Motion I

Whereas the acquisition of typesetting and related equipment will provide the Varsity with greater control and creativity in the production of the paper:

And whereas the money saved by doing our own typesetting and paste-up could be used to the paper's advantage in other areas (advertising promotion, the hiring of a business manager, new equipment)

Be it resolved that the purchase and installation of typesetting and related equipment be approved in principle for the up-coming publishing year on the strict understanding that the Varsity will have complete control of and responsibility for such equipment.

Motion II

Whereas the position of editor should not include administrative details that detract from his/her ability to oversee the content and production of the paper, and whereas the Varsity has had to rely in the past on editors whose financial expertise may not have been equal to the demands of the paper, or on a member of the Varsity committee who happened to have such expertise,

And whereas such expertise must be guaranteed on an ongoing basis,

And whereas the sound business management of the paper would further strengthen the paper's autonomy from the student council, and would be an excellent first step towards independent levy and complete financial autonomy from SAC:

Be it resolved that the Varsity hire a business manager for the year beginning April 1978 and she/he have the following responsibilities:

- the preparation and regulation of the Varsity budget, to include such tasks as:
 - the regulation of purchase orders for photo and other supplies,
 - the signing of cheques and the keeping of salary records,
 - the determination of costs per page,
 - the filing out of Youthstream appendix A's (if applicable),
 - the regulation of spending (on long distance calls etc),
- accounting, to include
 - regulating accounts payable and accounts receivable,
 - keeping the books,
 - arranging the audit of the Varsity's books,
- general managerial tasks, to include:
 - acting as a liaison between the Varsity or the Varsity and Cameron Consultants (if applicable),
 - arranging subscriptions of and for the Varsity,
 - handling business correspondence, orders for bound volumes, and maintenance of Varsity equipment (phones, typewriters etc),
 - making travel arrangements for CUP conferences,
 - miscellaneous office responsibilities (answering the phone in the morning etc)

Faculty replies

With reference to Monday's article, "No! to UTFA Wage Hike", please permit me to say that I was not only "surprised" at Provost Chant's statement, I was astounded.

It is extraordinary that the senior Vice-President of the University should issue statements to the press pertaining to a mediator's report (addressed to President Evans and myself) which had not at that point been made public. In fact, we had "agreed" with the Administration (in this case, Vice-President Iacobucci, chairman of the UTFA-Administration Joint Committee) that the report would be released in next Monday's Bulletin. (UTFA will now mail copies to its membership this week.)

Not only am I disturbed with the substance of Provost Chant's remarks (to which we will reply later in detail), but perhaps even more with the serious breach of faith which they represent. The rudiments of common courtesy — not to mention the ethics of negotiation — would have suggested that the Association be informed through regular channels prior to such "policy" pronouncements. This is especially true given our prior commitment. In this connection, I am at a loss to understand the basis of the Provost's statement, let alone its content. The Administration had its "day in court" before the mediator, and his report is now in. It now goes to Governing Council — where it is binding unless Governing Council explicitly rejects it. To judge from the tenor of Provost Chant's remarks, the Administration is not prepared to live by this rule. Instead, it wishes to be both judge and jury in its own cause. It will accept the findings of the mediator when they agree with what the Administration had offered (i.e., 3.75 per cent across-the-board); it will not accept his findings on low cost issues of equity and fringe benefits where he believed the Association correct. This will surely be grist for the mill of those who from the beginning have doubted the efficacy of a voluntary approach to the bargaining of salaries and benefits.

In no sense do I mean this letter to be a criticism of the Varsity, or Ms Kathy Canty who wrote the article. Ms Canty called me three times Sunday for information about the mediator's report, and on each occasion I declined comment. Not until Provost Chant gave his statement did I reply. In this connection, Ms Canty is to be congratulated for her perseverance and dedication; her quotes from me are entirely accurate and in context and I must assume the statements attributed to the Provost are also correct. If this is the case, then I can only lament Simcoe Hall's lack of judgement.

TV into school biz

By RAY SCHREMPF

It had to happen. For the first time in Canada, you can get a college education without leaving your living room. Almost. The only prerequisite is a television set.

On March 6 Seneca College will begin beaming its "Telecollege" product all over the city. Project Coordinator Toni Silberman boasts that there will now be "a little class" in the living rooms of all those people who do not have a chance to seek an education in the traditional manner.

Frightening images of the McLuhanesque city as a communications megalopolis are laid to rest by Silberman who says that the Telecollege will be more human than existing systems in Britain such as the B.B.C. "Ceefax" system, "Viewdata" or "Oracle." In Britain, students have access to a 1-million-page databank and all conversation is by computer, Silberman said.

There is no "Professor Hal" with the Seneca system according to Silberman, but each unit uses a variety of dramatizations, studio and on-site interviews, panel discussions, lectures and films. The student may talk with a professor by telephone but writes his exams at the college.

Only three courses will go on the air in March. Understanding Human Behaviour is one, geared to people who are "interested in such topics as hypnosis, E.S.P., Sigmund Freud and sexual inadequacy." Telecollege hopes to have more courses next term.

battle is not over yet. Bearden entered the struggle out of a personal interest: "It's right in front of my house, so obviously I'm concerned from that point of view." But further research into the project caused him to doubt the whole Hydro case.

"Hydro will make mis-statements of fact about things that we know to be true," he said, "so why should we believe them about things we don't know?"

The community activists are now working for an energy strategy that would emphasize conservation instead of accommodation to continual growth.

The Salaries Report

varg feature

By STEVE PETRANIK

Negotiations between the University administration and the University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA) over next year's salaries and benefits package for academic staff and professional librarians, reached a crucial point late last week with the release of an arbitrator's report.

The report's author, Professor Daniel A. Soberman, a member of the Faculty of Law at Queen's University, recommended the implementation of the administration's final offer of a 3.75 per cent salary increase. Soberman and the University administration both agreed that UTFA's final demand prior to arbitration of an eight per cent salary increase was not unreasonable in that it sought to keep up with current levels of inflation. However, Mr. Soberman also agreed with the University administration that the University would be unable to pay for an 8 per cent increase and still maintain other services, because of inadequate funding by the Ontario Government.

UTFA president Jean Smith said that he was disappointed with aspects of the report, especially the salary increase recommended, but that the Association would go along with that and the other proposals contained in the report.

Governing Council must now meet to decide on whether to accept the report's recommendations. If the report is rejected, the administration's final offer prior to arbitration would automatically be implemented.

Here are some of the proposals contained in the report:

- That rank salary ceilings be removed. Vice-Provost Chant has already stated that the administration is unwilling to accept the removal of ceilings except in unusual cases (as is now permitted). Soberman states that the University's position is based on the assumption that a person who is unable to earn a promotion cannot be making a full academic contribution to the University, especially as a scholar or researcher, and therefore should not receive top remuneration. But the report argues that certain faculty members are denied promotion because they are not adequate researchers or scholars, but may nonetheless deserve salary increases above the present ceiling because of excellence in teaching or other duties.

- An $800 salary increase for librarians in the two lowest ranks. Soberman recommends this special increase in order to bring librarians in the two junior ranks at the University into line with salaries paid those in similar positions at the Toronto Public Libraries. This increase would affect about 70 people, and therefore cost the administration about $55,000 according to the report. Chant has said the University is unwilling to accept this proposal.

- A merit fund for tutors equalling three per cent of their present salaries to begin next year. At present, a tutor at U of T could be anyone from a teacher at UTS to the equivalent of a lecturer. Soberman recommends that steps towards an improved classification of tutors be undertaken immediately.

- Implementation of a dental plan contingent upon the participation of 75 per cent of academic staff. The University administration unsuccessfully argued that its costs for any dental plan be taken from the salary increase, thereby reducing the increase from 3.75 to about 3.3 per cent. Instead, the University's share of the cost would be approximately $364,000. Soberman stated that he adopted this proposal instead of increased stipends for summer courses of 15.2 per cent (from $3,300 to $3,800) and for winter evening courses of 6 per cent (from $3,300 to $3,500). The administration supported the increased stipends believing that unless the stipends are increased, it will be difficult to attract qualified individuals to teach in these programs. To this Soberman added that the administration knew members of the faculty would have to accept the 3.75 per cent increase because they were more or less "captive" for the 1978-79 academic year, but that since many of the summer and winter evening courses would be filled by non-staff academics seeking jobs in a more open market, a large increase would be necessary. Soberman argued that such a disproportionate increase was unfair to regular staff members and therefore recommended the dental plan instead. If however insufficient staff sign up for the dental plan he agrees the money should go to increase the stipends.

- An increase in the guarantees on home mortgages. The report calls for an increase in the present guaranteed loan for first-time home purchasers from $20,000 to $40,000. In addition, it calls for a new plan to be designed for purchases of subsequent homes and for those seeking home improvements. Both the administration and UTFA are in agreement on this demand.

- Free tuition for dependents of academic staff. Soberman argues that this is a relatively low cost item, intended especially to help those with university age children. Chant found this recommendation unacceptable, claiming that it would be a scholarship based on birth rather than ability. UTFA President Jean Smith argues that such a scheme is already a fact at seven other universities including York (plus St. Michael's College here at U. of T.), and that free tuition does not guarantee acceptance at the University. He feels that such a benefit for faculty members is similar in many ways to the free air travel benefit given to airline employees.

- Maintenance of the present merit component. A proposal not in dispute between the two parties, the "Progress Through the Ranks" (PTR) component provides a mechanism for the economic recognition of additional knowledge and skills acquired by academic staff members each year.

Under the scheme each department chairman is allotted an amount of money which he distributes to members of his department according to merit. The amount is determined according to a plan based on the age-rank-salary profile of the University of Toronto faculty in 1972. The plan assumes that an individual enters his academic career at age 28 at the salary floor of the assistant professor rank and progresses through annual increments to a retirement salary of full professor at age 65.

The 1972 profile data permitted the construction of a model which provided for twenty annual increments of $700 followed by seventeen increments of $400, reflecting salary distribution at that time. These increments are adjusted annually by the amount of the economic increase awarded in the previous year. In 1977-78, the increments amounted to $935 and $535 and next year should be $993 and $568 respectively. Funds acquired under either category cannot be awarded to faculty who fall under the other category and are distributed within each department by the Chairman.

'Not an exact science'

By Steve Petranik

There seems to be no debate from either the U of T Faculty Association or arbitrator Soberman as to the relative inflexibility of the University's revenues. Government grants are tied to enrolment, and increased enrolment would further strain the University's capacity to teach. There does seem to be some debate as to the allocation of these revenues. Far be it from us, say UTFA to the administration, to substitute our judgment for yours on the details of a $250 million budget. But, we have reviewed your budget figures and are persuaded that many of your projected costs are variable and subjective in nature, and that it is possible for these figures to be revised by equally qualified officers so as to leave a larger sum for faculty salary increases.

In his report, Soberman agrees with this notion of arbitrary budget formulation. Although he and UTFA are specifically centering on that part of the budget which goes towards academic salaries, their argument holds true for all aspects of the budget including those aspects which directly affect students. Here is an excerpt from Soberman's report in which he discusses specific budget models which deal only with changes in revenue and spending from last year's budget:

"As already noted, I have no grounds for substituting my judgment on the soundness of budget items for the judgment of the University's officers. I cannot say, 'That item is too high' or, 'This item should be eliminated.' On the other hand, I have before me two proposals drawn just six days apart. The first, 'TABLE 1 BUDGET MODEL, AMPLIFICATION TO BC 10 Rev. 1' dated February 3, 1978, contains some twenty items other than totals and sub-totals. The second, 'BUDGET MODEL, BC 10 Rev. 4' dated February 9, 1978, is a revised version, in which well over half of the items have been recalculated. As sample items of change, the two largest 'Program needs and other addbacks' has been changed from 9.9 to 2.1 million, and 'inflation of non-salary budgets' has been changed from two to one million. As a result of these cuts, added to other item cuts, 'Rollbacks to be assigned' in the sum of $3.8 million has been eliminated.

"The effect of all these item changes is to leave the budget bottom line unaffected. However, the fact that changes of this order can be undertaken within a few days, based on doubt on agonizing scrutiny of the budget, reflection and judgement, does illustrate that we are not in the area of exact science. While I cannot recommend that the University simply make all the calculations in one direction and thus produce funds for a substantial rise in the economic increase offered, it leads me to conclude that there is no magic or exact precision in the proposed 3.75 per cent economic increase."

Both budget models dealt with here deal only with increases in revenue and spending over last year. The increase in revenue and spending is $15.2 million, $8.9 million of which goes to increased salaries and benefits. The revisions that Soberman refers to must be seen in view of this "bottom line."

NOMINATIONS OPEN

Nominations are open and interest is high as Decision '78 opens at the University of Toronto. Up for grabs are the SAC Presidential and two Vice-Presidential positions, 63 seats on the SAC Board of Directors, and three positions on the Varsity Committee. The Fees Referendum will be on the same ballot, so Decision '78 promises to be a very hot judgement on where you see the Students' Administrative Council going for the next while.

Nomination forms and election rules are available at all SAC locations. Any full-time, undergraduate, SAC fee-paying student is eligible to run. Nominations will close at noon on Friday, March 3rd. The big days — Election Days — are Wednesday, March 15th and Thursday, March 16th. Remember to bring your student card with you when you go to vote.

Laszlo Pandya has been chosen to be this year's Chief Returning Officer. He will be the person who watches over the election and makes sure that everything follows procedures set down by the Election Committee.

If you have been looking for a chance to have your say in how things are run at SAC, now is your chance to show people how it should be done. It doesn't take much effort to pick up a nomination form, get it signed and return it to SAC... but don't leave doing this for the last minute. Remember: of those running for the President and two Vice-President spots — all on the same ticket — one must come from the professional faculties, one from Arts and Science, and one from either Scarborough or Erindale. If this regulation, or anything else related to SAC, annoys you, this is your time to get involved, to work towards making changes you believe are necessary. No one else can do it for you!

One hundred signatures are needed by the Presidential Ticket; those running for the Board of Directors will need ten signatures from members of their faculty or college. Varsity Committee candidates will need twenty-five.

Interest is already high-pitched, and one can hear some interesting views being expressed. Students are showing concern over cutbacks and the cancelling of tutorials. Some think that SAC has not done enough to mobilize, organize, or unite students. Others think that SAC should offer more services. One hears people crying about both student apathy and the fact that SAC has lost contact with "the grass roots".

Is there a lack of direction in the Students' Administrative Council? Or do you like the way things have been going, just fine? Whatever your view, there couldn't be a better time to get involved.

Simply put, why don't YOU run?

LASZLO PANDYA

FAITH AND SEXUALITY WORKSHOP TONIGHT

Members of the university community have been responding positively to the Sexual Education Centre's Sexuality Awareness Week. Two free forums have already been held this week in the Medical Science Auditorium. Meaningful dialogues between both sexes have taken place covering a broad spectrum of issues surrounding sexuality. It is the Centre's plan to present controversial issues and to stimulate debate, but the Centre does not necessarily support any one view over another.

Tonight's workshop at Med Sci (beginning at 8 p.m.) features Dr. Gregory Baum, Professor of Religion at St. Michael's College discussing Faith and Sexuality — A Judaic-Christian Perspective. Dr. Baum is the author of the recently published book, Religion and Alienation.

The SAC-funded U of T Sexual

DR. GREGORY BAUM

Education Centre, located at 44 St. George Street, Room 25, would like to remind people of its hours: Monday to Friday from 11 to 3 and 5 to 7 on Wednesdays.

SLAVERY

Dr. Eugene Genovese, Professor of American History at the University of Rochester, New York and a leading expert on slavery — both past and present, will be appearing at Scarborough College on Friday, February 24th. This free lecture and discussion will take place at 2:00 p.m. in R3103, the Campbell Lounge. The topic to be looked at is Afro-American Slave Revolts Before 1798. Dr. Genovese is being brought to the U of T by both SAC and the Scarborough College History Association.

Dr. Genovese is a flamboyant speaker and a most amiable man. He is the President of the Organization of American Historians and the published author of a great many books, among them Roll, Jordan Roll, The Plantation Economy of the South and The World Slaveholders Built.

An exciting question and answer period is expected.

GRADING PRACTICES

The Grading Practices Policy passed last year by the Governing Council of the University of Toronto is now under review by the Sub-Committee on Curriculum Standards. There are six student representatives on this Sub-Committee and SAC is looking for your opinions and comments so that these students can best serve your interests. A pamphlet entitled MARKSmanship is available at all five SAC locations. We hope you will fill out the attached questionnaire, and become better acquainted with the issues involved.

It seems to be appropriate to hope that certain sections of the present Grading Practices Policy be retained — especially those sections that deal with the marking schemes, with when a professor can change the marking schemes, and with professorial commentaries on term papers. SAC is hopeful that the revised policy also include the following: 1. That there be a minimum time limit for notice of tests. 2. That on the exam, the relative weight of individual questions is noted. 3. That after papers have been marked, solution papers for the problems are provided, and 4. That in all faculties, a student can have accessibility to a copy of the exam that has been taken.

The pamphlet MARKSmanship will acquaint you with many facts about the present Grading Practices Policy. Did you know that professors must tell you the marking scheme being used in their courses? Did you know that professors cannot change the scheme without majority consent of the class? Did you know that professors cannot change your final mark by the use of a bell curve? Read SAC's pamphlet MARKSmanship.

Pro-Life needs support in Toronto

By ALAN STEWART

Tom Lynch, president of the Canadian Youth Pro-Life Organization, told an audience of 15 yesterday that the pro-life movement needed revitalization in Toronto if further defeats over euthanasia, abortion, and capital punishment are to be avoided. Lynch, a student at the University of Western Ontario, spoke to U of T proliferators in Hart House.

Lynch said that support in Toronto is crucial for the movement because of what Lynch called "the forces of death:" fetal experimentation. He cited Mount Sinai hospital as the centre of such experimentation in Canada. Sick Children's Hospital, he said, leaves hundreds of retarded children to die every year.

Lynch said that his group opposes devaluation of life at every stage from conception to natural death, and that it lost about one-third of its supporters when it took a stand against capital punishment.

A boycott against Upjohn Company is currently the movement's major concern. Lynch accused Upjohn, a medical service firm, of using the Third World to test its new birth-control and abortion drugs in their initial stages, a process which Lynch said involved considerable uncompensated suffering and loss of life.

Lynch urged supporters to use unconventional tactics to press their case. "Join any and every political party," he said. "I've been in the Liberal Party for seven years and the Conservative Party for five. I tried to join the NDP, but I couldn't talk about workers' rights without laughing."

Women's Ski Team Takes Second; Earns Invitation to Lake Placid

After a slow start this season the women's ski team rebounded to finish second in the OUSKI series which concluded at Georgian Peaks Feb. 9 and 10.

The second place finish ensured them an invitation to the Can-Am meet at Lake Placid on March 6 to 10.

The team was led by captain Andrea Esson who took top individual honours with 30 points. Second place went to Susan Graves of Waterloo.

On the first day of competition the women's team all but had the race won after the first run. Besides Esson, Karen Kingsmill and Kerstein Schumacher also finished in the top ten.

Things fell apart on the second run however as both Kingsmill and Schumacher fell. The result was a fifth place finish for U of T.

The men's team skied strongly, placing second to Queen's on the opening day. Mike Owen finished fifth in the slalom to pace the team.

On the second day of competition the women upset Waterloo to place first. Esson placed third but it at first appeared that this would not be enough to guarantee victory as Waterloo placed three skiers in the top ten. Toronto's fourth skier, Brenda Webster turned in a good performance however, beating Waterloo's fourth, to catapult Toronto to first place.

The men's team also skied well on the second day. Mark Bell finished first and Owen came in second in the giant slalom to give Toronto first place.

The men finished second in the series standings and will also be going to Lake Placid.

Campbell's Swimmers: M'mm M'mm Good

By HUGH STUART

If someone had told U of T swim coach Robin Campbell two weeks ago that the Blues would capture their seventeenth consecutive Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) championship, he probably would have laughed. But win they did, as the Varsity Swim Blues came up with a top effort to edge the defending Canadian champion Waterloo Warriors 538-489 at McMaster last weekend.

Before the meet began, Campbell conceded that the Blues, underdogs for the first time in many years, were not as high-powered a team as Waterloo. It was a combination of determined swimming and effective entry juggling that led to the victory.

Since he is a coach of Canada's student national team, Campbell knew the abilities of many of the Blues' opponents and was able to predict U of T's chances in most races. When he saw the Blues' chances of winning a particular race were slim, he juggled his entrants and concentrated on winning or placing high in other races.

However, a coach can do only so much. It is the swimmers that have to come through. U of T had only three victories in eighteen events. It was the team's depth that brought them the championship, as constant placings in the top six proved to be too much for Waterloo.

The Blues' three victories were recorded by Dan Thompson in the 100 metre butterfly, John Lyall in the 200 metre butterfly, and the foursome of Brad Myers, John Watt, Thompson, and Lyall in the 400 metre medley relay.

Kevin Hebner turned in an amazing performance placing second in three events: the 200 metre backstroke, the 100 metre backstroke, and the 400 metre individual medley — an event that he hadn't competed in this season.

U of T also did well in the freestyle department as Ian MacDonald took second in the 400 and 1500 metre freestyle and Mike Hibberd was runner-up in the 100 metre freestyle.

Their unexpected success has given the team an important psychological lift as they look ahead to the CIAU championships to be held at the Etobicoke Olympium on March 2, 3, and 4. As Campbell puts it, "If we had lost the OU's we'd probably have been down psychologically. But our unexpected success has told us that we can beat these guys (Waterloo)."

Although university teams from across Canada will be competing at the Olympium, the main opposition should come from within Ontario. Waterloo, led by the highly-publicized Heinbuch brothers will again be hard on the heels of the Blues. Last year Waterloo lost the OUAA championship to the Blues but rebounded to defeat U of T in the CIAU's. The other threat will be from Lakehead University. They have a nucleus of four very strong swimmers, but whether the team has the necessary depth is not known.

Between now and March 2, the coaches will be spending a great deal of time in the back rooms planning strategy for the CIAUs. As Campbell says, "It's like a chess game. We know that we can't overpower them so we'll have to outmanoeuvre them. We'll have to get our swimmers in as many finals as possible and then count on them to come through."

If the coaches can plot the proper strategy, and if the swimmers can dig down for that 'little extra' then the Blues may be able to wrestle the CIAU crown from Waterloo and bring it back to where it has been for eleven of the last twelve years.

Whatever the outcome, the meet should feature some outstanding competition and would be well worth a visit by any sports fan.

The Varsity — Veronica Becke

Swim Team Captain Rick Madge will lead the Blues in the CIAU Championships.

York Gives Blues Third Place

By ANGELO CALLEGARI

It seemed like destiny was on the side of the U of T wrestling team as they placed third in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) finals at York last weekend.

The York Yeomen had a chance to overcome the Blues and finish third but failed to do so after Sam Turchoiro of Toronto so thoroughly defeated York's John Sestito that he withdrew from the competition. If Sestito had shown up for his next bout he would have received enough points to guarantee a third place finish for York.

Western placed first by upsetting the two-time defending champs from Guelph. The competition was close however as the eleven competing teams produced the highest calibre of wrestling this tournament has ever seen.

Toronto's best performer was Joe Preobrazenski who placed first in the 177 pound class. Preobrazenski fought well and either pinned or outpointed all his opponents. The climax of his day was a pin against Grant Hughson of Western who was highly favoured to place first.

A solid performance was turned in by Ed Rector who placed third in the 190 pound class. This achievement is remarkable in light of the fact that Rector was fighting underweight.

Rookie Allan Tamane showed the potential of Toronto's rookies by his third place finish in the 118 pound class. Rookie Eric Boss also fought well to place fourth in the hotly contested heavyweight category.

Glen Woichecyn and Allan Kosugi placed fifth in the 167 and 126 pound classes respectively. Kosugi pinned an opponent from Queen's in his best fight of the meet.

Frank Buffone, Gordon Cheung and Angelo Callegari were unlucky victims of the draw and were eliminated on the first day of competition.

This weekend the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union championships will be held at Royal Military College in Kingston. Preobrazenski and Tamane will be representing the U of T.

Blues Seek Old Form In Upcoming Playoff Opener

By JIM O'LEARY

The Hockey Blues are hoping to break out of the mini-slump they have fallen into when they meet the Ryerson Rams in the opening game of the playoffs this Friday night at Varsity Arena.

While it is hard to imagine a team which has won 18 of its 20 league games being in a slump, coach Tom Watt is unhappy about the way the team has been playing lately. In their last five games (including an exhibition contest against Concordia) the Blues have lost twice and won twice by only one goal.

Their losses to York and Concordia were the result of an uncommon malady for the Blues this season: they lost their touch around the net.

Over the season the Blues averaged 8.5 goals per game but managed a total of only five goals in their two recent losses. This is Watt's main concern as the playoffs are near.

"The games we lost were because we stopped scoring goals. It's a myth to say we haven't been playing defensive enough," said Watt.

The fact that the Blues have been scoring at a torrid pace all season has detracted from their impressive defensive performance. They allowed only 53 goals in their 20 league games — by far the best in the OUAA.

According to Watt, "last year everyone was saying we had such a great defensive team. Well, our goals against this year are far better than last year."

"If you look back over the whole season you see that the games we lost were because we stopped scoring — not because we weren't defensive enough. The only high scoring game we lost was 6-5 to Whitby in our first exhibition game of the season."

Another concern of Watt's is deciding which players to dress for Friday. Because OUAA rules restrict the lineup to 17, Watt is faced with some tough decisions since he carries 22 players on the team.

Who dresses will depend on his strategy. He is undecided whether to go with ten forwards and five defencemen or nine forwards and six blueliners.

Watt prefers the nine-six arrangement. "I'd like to go that way. We used it 75 percent of the time this season and we were successful. The only drawback is that we could be in trouble if a forward gets hurt in a sudden death game and there is no one to back him up."

Ryerson finished second in the weak Central Division with a 9-6 record.

In their only meeting this year the Blues walloped the Rams 10-2.
